Jewish judokas win gold at Ontario meet

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO —Joel Gerson doesn't like to send his fighters into a major competition unless they're totally prepared, both physically and mentally.

So you'd have to consider the eight judokas from Gerson's Samurai Academy as ready, able and more than prepared, if their results at the Ontario Open Junior Novice Championships are any indication.

The Samurai Academy's young athletes wiped the mat with their opponents, winning seven gold medals and one bronze. The bronze shoulda', woulda', coulda' been a gold, except for a judging decision that Gerson doesn't really want to talk about too much.

Nevertheless, all four of the Academy's Jewish fighters – Shane Herberman, 14, Jonathan Bodenstein, 14, Michael Rubenstein, 12, and Lielle Levy, 10 – were good as gold.

"I was pretty confident in their abilities, but you never know in these things," Gerson said.

Not only did the Samurai kids win, they dominated their matches, often winning in quick order.

Herberman, a student at Westmount Collegiate Institute in Vaughan, came up with his best performance in a competition so far, winning the juvenile 69-kilo championship fight with an "uchimata" throw.

"In the last match, I got in there, we fought for a few minutes, and out of nowhere, I got this really nice throw," he explained.

The uchimata consists of quick footwork between your opponent's legs to bring him off balance, followed by a decisive push to bring him down.

In an earlier match, Herberman employed the "drop seo," a shoulder throw, which ended the fight in less than a minute. "I saw the opening and I went for my throw," he said.

A pre-competition regimen that left little to chance was a key factor in his win, Herberman said.

"There was extremely intense preparation for the physical aspects of the competition," he said. "Mentally, it's a relaxed preparation, because you want to think out your fight and see what you'll be doing."

Herberman works out at the academy four times a week for an hour at a time. His routine consists of cardio work, exercises to build strength and stamina, as well as plenty of repetition of technique.

Gerson figures most young athletes at major competitions are in good shape, so mastering technique and being mentally prepared often makes the difference.

His group not only "worked their butts off," but they absorbed the more esoteric and even hypnotizing aspects of mental preparation. This consists of "positive visualization in a very relaxed state," he explained.

Simply put, visualization allows athletes to imagine their opponents' moves and to respond quickly with effective counter moves.

"If you can't see yourself winning, you have to go back and start again," Gerson said. "If you visualize mistakes, panic or anxiety, that tells you have to improve mentally.

"It can be pretty strong for the kids," he said. "The psychological aspects of a competition are a big deal. It's very normal to be nervous going in."

Gerson, 26, is no stranger to high pressure, big time matches. A few years ago, he and his mentor, martial arts expert Moni Aizik, travelled to Japan for a high profile, televised match against Rumina Sato, the country's five-time champion in Shooto, a mixed discipline of martial arts.

Gerson stunned the Japanese experts with a remarkable victory. The two fighters split a couple of rematches.

Gerson was introduced to the martial arts 13 years ago by Aizik, who ran lessons at the Bathurst Jewish Community Centre. He moved with Aizik to the Samurai Club when the Israeli opened his own martial arts school. When Aizik returned to Israel a few months ago, Gerson took over the academy and remained chief instructor in judo and grappling. About 100 students ranging in age from seven to 14 train under Gerson.

A proponent of hard work, Gerson believes there's a lot of truth in the old adage, "It's better to sweat in practice than to bleed in competition."

"What we're doing is building character," he said. "If you develop success at an early age, it carries over into other areas of adult life… We teach them to set goals and take steps to accomplish them."

Olympic gold medalist to swim at Maccabiah Games

By TOM TUGEND
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

LOS ANGELES — Lenny Krayzelburg, America's Olympic triple gold-medal winner in swimming, intends to skip the World Championships in Japan in order to compete at the Maccabiah Games next July in Israel.

"I have never been to Israel and I would really like to go there and compete," Krayzelburg told Reuters news service. "It is a very important part of my heritage."

The 25-year-old athlete said he might reconsider his decision if violence in the Middle East escalates between now and July. But he emphasized that the so-called "Jewish Olympics" was his first choice.

Born in Odessa, Ukraine, Krayzelburg left the Soviet Union with his parents in 1989, when he was 13, in part to escape anti-Semitism.

He captured the gold at the 2000 Olympic Games in Sydney, Australia, in both the 100- and 200-metre backstroke, both in Olympic record time, and he led off the U.S. world record-setting 4x100 medley relay team.

In a recent interview, Krayzelburg said he plans to work with Jewish and immigrant children.

"I may be wrong, but there might be a perception that Jewish kids are not athletic," he said. "Maybe I can change that trend."

Krayzelburg said he plans to swim competitively through the 2004 Olympics in Athens. By then he'll be 29, which is old for a world-class swimmer. Three other Jewish American Olympic swimming medalists – Anthony Ervin, who tied for gold in the 50-metre freestyle, and relay silver medalists Jason Lezak and Scott Goldblatt – may also participate in the Maccabiah Games.

However, the three qualified their plans, saying if they can make the American team, they'll head for the World Championships instead.

"Lenny has already experienced Worlds, and I have not," Lezak said.

Stories that touch the heart

A World Without Jews

On a recent trip to Johannesburg, I met Don Krausz, a Holocaust survivor originally from Rotterdam in the Netherlands.

Don was only a boy when the Nazis occupied Holland. Most of the schools in the area had been destroyed or damaged in the bombing of Rotterdam.

One day, as he left school, Don found his classmates throwing stones at a boy he had never seen before, as the boy cowered against the school wall. Later, Don learned that the boy, Pietro, had an Italian father reputed to be one of the leading fascists in Rotterdam. His classmates' action reflected their sense of helplessness against the Nazis and was an expression of revenge against anything connected with the Germans.

Whatever their motivation, though, Don did not like what he saw, and he intervened.

After that, Don often walked Pietro home from school. He found Pietro to be intelligent and not at all anti-Semitic. However, Don was never allowed into the home of the boy he protected. Pietro's father would never countenance a Jew entering his home.

As the Nazi grip on Europe tightened, the plight of its Jews also worsened. Don and his family were deported to the east, with Don himself being sent to Westerbork, Ravensbruk and finally Sachsenhausen.

As the war neared its end, the 14-year-old Don was forced to take part in a death march. Eventually a small group – Don, another Jewish boy and seven non-Jewish Dutch male prisoners – were separated from their captors and approached Hagenau, a small town in Germany.

The streets were deserted, the windows shuttered and the doors closed. It appeared to Don that the locals feared their intentions, seeing they were obviously concentration camp survivors. The men stopped to rest at the well that stood at the centre of the town.

Suddenly a door opened and a little child of about six ran out and begged Don to play with her. Don obliged the child for awhile, then returned to his group. The Dutch men, however, were outraged at his willingness to have anything to do with the "enemy."

"I was too young to argue with them, but thought that they were wrong," Don observed to me. "Today I know that they were wrong; one does not victimize a child."

Don returned to Rotterdam, but could not find any members of his family or community. Nearing one of his childhood streets, he suddenly found himself face to face with Pietro, the boy he had defended.

"Don! You're still alive!" Pietro exclaimed.

"Yes I am still alive," Don responded. Then, without a further word, Don turned and walked away. He never saw Pietro again.

I was puzzled by Don's reaction. Why was he so willing to play with the German girl, and yet would not spend a moment with his childhood friend?

"That's an interesting question," Don reflected. "My actions were purely spontaneous, unpremeditated. Maybe the little girl reminded me of my little sister, to whom she bore a resemblance. And as I said before, even then I knew it was wrong to victimize a child."

He paused, then continued, "But Pietro, my childhood friend, that's another matter. His words: "You are still alive" had the opposite effect to what I am sure he intended. Though he meant no malice, the implication of his exclamation pained me deeply. His surprise reflected an expectation that all the Jews of Holland were meant to be dead – me, my family, my friends. This is what was supposed to have happened.

"His natural acceptance of this reality – a reality of a world without Jews – made it impossible for me to continue any kind of relationship with him."

About Life

Dear Ella,

My parents raised my brother and me to be good, caring people. We grew up in a close family. Now we are working adults with families of our own. Since my father passed on, our elderly mother, who lives on her own, needs extra care.

I always make sure to speak to her every day and see her at least three or four times a week. I do her shopping, take her to appointments and help with her hygiene.

What does my brother do? Nothing! Mom is lucky if she hears from him once every couple of weeks and she's fine with that because he is a "busy man." The responsibility for her care seems to have landed squarely on my shoulders because, in her eyes, I'm the daughter and it's expected of me. I've had enough of this nonsense. How do I rectify this injustice without causing a rift between my brother and me?

Betrayed By Big Brother

Dear Betrayed By Big Brother,

I don't think it's unusual for people of your mother's generation to feel that taking care of anything domestic is woman's work and bringing home a paycheque is man's work. To her, this absolves your brother from having to help with her care. It also explains why she is happy with just a bi-weekly phone call. I don't think there is any point in trying to change your mother's expectations. Your problem is with your brother. Here is a man living in the 21st century and taking advantage of your kindness and hard work and your mother's way of thinking. He is trying to get away with as little as possible and that is not acceptable.

You need to get the message across to him. You can do it in person, although this kind of topic can get very emotional and heated. Or you can do it in writing. Sometimes you can get your point across better in writing, as it gives you the ability to get your thoughts out without interruption.

In the meantime, take comfort in knowing what a good daughter you are. Believe me when I say you will never be sorry for doing all that you can for your mother.

Israel aids PA beef

By DANIEL SOBELMAN
Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — Israeli officials sent some 220,000 doses of hoof and mouth disease vaccine to the Palestinian Authority (PA) Sunday, in response to a suspected outbreak of the disease on the West Bank.

The assistance came despite the fact that Israeli experts are not convinced that a hoof and mouth outbreak has occurred in the territories.

PA agriculture minister Hikmat Zaid says 13 animals in the territories have been afflicted by hoof and mouth disease.

Sharon is ready to move Gaza settlers

By ZE'EV SCHIFF
Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — If Yasser Arafat is ready to accept Prime Minister Ariel Sharon's proposed plan for "ongoing interim agreements," Sharon is ready to evacuate a number of Gaza Strip settlements to give the Palestinian Authority (PA) more territorial contiguity in the densely populated area. But Sharon's offer does not include a similar arrangement in the West Bank.

Sharon is prepared to offer this fundamental proposal when the negotiations with the Palestinians resume. He plans to outline his approach in his conversations with President George W. Bush and other U.S. administration leaders this week.

The underlying assumption in Sharon's plan is that there is currently no chance for a comprehensive agreement with the Palestinians that would settle all the outstanding differences between the two peoples and reach an end to the conflict. Therefore, his proposal to the Palestinians is based on partial agreements.

To ease Palestinian concerns that his offer is merely a trick meant to leave most of the territory in Israeli hands for a long period of time, Sharon is emphasizing that this first interim agreement will be followed by others, in which the Palestinians would make gains.

EU criticizes Israel's policies

EU president and Swedish foreign minister Anna Lindh (centre) and EU commissioner for external relations Christopher Patten (left), were in Israel last week for a one-day visit. They asked the Israeli government to ease its economic sanctions on the Palestinian Authority. At this press conference in Jerusalem, Israeli foreign minister Shimon Peres, defended Israel's policies and reminded the EU officials of the rampant corruption within the PA. Lindh and Patten promised to more closely monitor funds transferred to the PA by the EU in the future. Arab states, themselves concerned about PA corruption, have handed over to the PA only $8 million (US) out of the $1.3 billion pledged at last October's Arab League summit. Yasser Arafat is rumoured to have amassed a fortune of some say even in the billions. He has reportedly offered Saddam Hussein $20 million to provide him shelter in Iraq if he has to leave Gaza in a hurry. [Israel photo]

Objects to Prayer

HALIFAX — The only Jewish MLA in Nova Scotia says that prayers do not belong in provincial legislatures. The Lord's Prayer has been recited in the Nova Scotia legislature every day that the house has been in session since at least 1791. But NDP MLA Howard Epstein says that he feels excluded by the prayer, and he boycotts the daily ritual. He said his main objection is to the concept of politicians praying. "The public may feel anything that would help politicians would be worthwhile," he says. "[But] it's inappropriate. I do tend to believe in a separation of church and state."

Election Fraud

LONDON — Two Jewish elected officials face up to 10 years in jail after being convicted recently of vote fraud. A court found that Isaac Leibowitz of the Conservative party and Zev Lieberman, a Liberal Democrat, fraudulently added names to the electoral rolls, resulting in a 2,000 percent increase in proxy votes in their ward in the 1998 election to the local council. According to the Crown attorney, the fraud was massive enough to deprive Labour of a council majority in London's East End borough of Hackney. During the trial, the court heard that Leibowitz and Lieberman registered 88 voters from a yeshiva that had room for only 30 students. They also registered American and Yemeni citizens as eligible to vote. The two are scheduled to be sentenced April 6.

William Epstein Was UN Diplomat

NEW YORK — William Epstein, among the most senior Canadian diplomats at the United Nations and a tireless crusader for nuclear disarmament, died here recently. He was 88.

He had been involved in official disarmament efforts for 50 years, longer than anyone else.

Born in Calgary, Epstein trained as a lawyer and following World War II, served as a Jewish adviser to the first Arab-Israeli peace talks when an international committee tried to draft a plan for the region. Epstein argued that partition of the British Mandate of Palestine into two states – one Jewish and one Arab, with Jerusalem as an international zone – was the only solution. His work won him a personal letter of thanks from Israel's first president, Chaim Weizmann.

In 1950, he was named permanent chief of the United Nations' Middle East section, but Arab countries protested the appointment. Instead, the UN made Epstein director of its Disarmament Group, a job he held until his retirement in 1971.

Arab-language newspapers attack Jews

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Montreal police have been asked to investigate two Arab-language newspaper articles that Canadian Jewish Congress believes may pose a danger to Jews.

The articles employ "inflammatory invective," are "particularly irresponsible" and could violate Canada's anti-hate laws, said Dorothy Zalcman Howard, president of Congress' Quebec region. "There has been a lot of negative propaganda out there, and given the volatile situation in the Middle East, it is particularly egregious and irresponsible for this material to appear."

The objects of Zalcman Howard's concern are two articles that appeared in Al Moustakbal (The Future), a weekly newspaper published in Montreal that is also available in Toronto and Ottawa.

Written by freelancer Elias Bittar, the articles accuse Jews of manipulation, disloyalty and greed.

In an excerpt from a Jan. 31 article, translated by Naim Dallal, an officer of Congress, Bittar writes: "The faith of the Jews did not allow them to practise loyalty and they were therefore the enemy to the people. They lived on their land and sold the people's interest and souls to any buyer and at any price."

A second article, which ran in the paper's Nov. 15 edition, translated by Sasson Mayer, states: "Our enemy the Jews, in every place there are Jews targeting our land and depriving us of it... We must organize in aiming to eliminate their filth."

"This is the kind of inflammatory rhetoric that has crossed the line," Zalcman Howard said. "We're concerned that the author is asking readers to do harm to the Jews." The reference to eliminating Jewish filth "is a particularly dangerous exhortation," she said.

Al Moustakbal editor Marie Rejouli acknowledged that "there is something not acceptable in the two articles, especially the November article."

Rejouli said she has spoken to Bittar and instructed him to write an article explaining his earlier pieces.

"He said it was not his intention to refer to Jews. His intention was to say the Israelis in the occupied territories of Palestine" and to refer to historic manipulation of Jews by Turkish authorities, Rejouli said. "Many Arab people, when they write their opinions, they confuse Jews and Israelis," Rejouli said, speaking in halting English. "Personally, I condemn very strongly this thing," she said. "I asked him to write and explain. It's a form of apologizing."

Rejouli said the original articles would never have appeared if the paper's regular copy editor had been at work. That person was on vacation in Lebanon during the time in question and a "temporary editor" took his place. "We had a few bloopers" involving other stories as well, Rejouli said. "We soundly condemn any form of hate literature," she added.

Mayer, who periodically monitors the Arab language press, believes the amount of anti-Semitic invective in a variety of papers has escalated in recent years.

"The level of rhetoric is getting worse," he said. "Before, in previous articles, they attacked Zionism, Israel, In one article, they said it was a pity Hitler didn't finish them off. Now it's reaching a point where they are talking about 'our enemy, the Jews.' What can we expect the next time? If they reach a point of calling us their enemies here in Canada, how far will they go without stopping them?"

About four years ago, Mayer brought several articles to the attention of The CJN. The articles appeared in Al-Orouba (The Arab) and Al-Miraat (The Mirror). The June 1996 Al-Orouba article questioned the Holocaust, and suggested world society "is under the wicked and poisonous Jewish influence."

An October 1996 article in Al-Miraat stated, "History has taught us that you cannot trust their side."

After meeting with a Congress delegation that was accompanied by Rashad Saleh, president of Palestine House, the editor of Al-Orouba agreed to print an apology and retraction.

Al-Miraat subsequently went out of business.

Mayer believes the Jewish community must confront this type of poisonous rhetoric on every occasion, or else expect a continued escalation.

Zalcman Howard said Congress expects Al-Moustakbal to retract the story and apologize for it. "We would also want some assurances that this type of propaganda will not appear and be sanctioned in the future," she said.

The dangers extremists pose

From the editor's desk

Extremism, fanaticism, monomaniacal zealotry of any religion or ideology – or, in fact, of any stripe – generally bring with them great danger for others.

They close the mind to the notion of compromise, to the very idea of discussion or debate. And without the possibility of discussion, of the use of reason, violence, the unilateral imposition of will, becomes the fanatic's preferred alternative.

Throughout the ages, alas, religion has proven to be one of the most fertile of all harvesting fields for the unique malevolence wrought by extremism and fanaticism.

For example, Christianity has bred the Crusades and the Inquisition, to name but two instances.

Islam often proselytized by the sword.

Nor has Judaism been immune. In recent times, we have seen Yigal Amir and Baruch Goldstein shed others' blood in the name of their God.

But we must always remember, by definition, that the extremist is not representative of the norm, of the mainstream, of the balanced middle where most people throughout the span of time have tried and try, even today, to live out their days.

Very often we lose sight of this truth because the man-in-the-middle is bullied by the extremist, overpowered and shunted to the side by the fanatic's ruthless resolve.

It is through this framework that we must try to assess the destruction by the Taliban regime of Afghanistan of the two towering statues of Buddha in Bamiyan.

The two statues, 52 and 36 metres high, were hewn and sculpted some 1,500 years ago out of the rock of the very mountain in which they stood. They were engineering and artistic marvels, a testament to man's creative genius, one of humanity's timeless treasures no less than the pyramids or the Taj Mahal.

Taliban leader Mullah Mohammed Omar had ordered the statues to be destroyed because, according to his strict code of Islamic law, the statues were considered to be idolatrous.

International cultural officials pleaded with him in an effort to save the statues. Emissaries from Egypt and Pakistan also tried to dissuade him from proceeding with his plans.

To no avail.

Omar's mind was closed. He would hear no discussion on the matter. As far as he was concerned, it was not a matter for the rest of the world. As one reporter in the New York Times recently wrote, "The world, including the world of Islamic scholarship, was outraged and could barely find the words for what had happened. An assault on history? On culture itself?"

She then interviewed various scholars on the subject, who she reported as being critical of the Taliban's "failure at governance, treatment of women and tolerance of the opium and drug trade." But each was surprisingly "understanding" regarding the destruction of the statues, "explaining" the behaviour rather than condemning it.

"I would dare say they [the Taliban] have no idea what Buddhas are or what Buddhism is. We say they're destroying their national history. None of the Taliban went to schools where they were taught their national history," Barnett Rubin of New York University was quoted as saying.

This somewhat equivocal reaction is too forgiving. Mullah Omar need not have understood the precise reason for the religious and cultural importance of the statues; sufficient it should have been that others pointed out to him the fact of the statues' religious and cultural significance.

Desecrated gravestones on the Mount of Olives.

Imagine what his response would be if a shrine, not in Afghanistan but nevertheless holy to Islam, were wilfully destroyed by non-Muslims. He'd very likely utter a cry of jihad.

The incident of the Bamiyan statues should give Israel and Jews around the world cause to be concerned.

Taliban extremism is of a piece with the extremism of Islamic Jihad, Hezbollah and Hamas. Time and again, these fundamentalist organizations have made clear that their struggle is not only with Israel but with Judaism, not only with Israelis but with Jews.

Jews already know what extremists might do to holy Jewish places, if given the opportunity. Last October, Joseph's tomb was destroyed, its sifrei Torah and holy texts ransacked. Between 1948 and 1967, the Jewish quarter of Jerusalem was literally laid waste. Fifty-eight synagogues were destroyed or desecrated. In the cemetery on the Mount of Olives, hallowed to Jews for thousands of years, some 38,000 of the 50,000 tombstones were torn up and used as paving stones, wall supports or pieces in latrines.

Let no one underestimate the dangers these extremists pose to Israel and to Judaism.

Survivors flock to clinics on slave labour forms

By RON CSILLAG
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Frieda Rosenberg knows that she and her husband Phillip never can be adequately compensated for their years of backbreaking slave labour during World War II.

But the Toronto couple completed their coldly-worded forms last week in order to receive roughly $10,000 each from the $7.9 billion fund set up last year by the German government and German industries to compensate war-era slave and forced labourers.

They were among the dozens of local Holocaust survivors who are availing themselves of special clinics that are helping former Nazi slaves put their documents in order.

Since March 5, when the clinics began in a room at the Lipa Green Building, 20 survivors a week have been helped with their paperwork, says project co-ordinator Barbara Barak. A further 20 to 30 people call every day for information, she added.

> 'There's a real need out there'

"There's a real need out there," Barak observed.

Between 7,000 and 8,000 survivors in Toronto are believed eligible for compensation for slave labour. All former inmates of concentration camps and ghettos are encouraged to complete the applications.

The volunteer-staffed clinics are intended to help one-time slaves fill out three different forms. Those survivors who have never received any compensation from Germany, or have been refused, are required to fill out a detailed, six-page form.

Those who have received monthly pensions known as Wiedergutmachung complete a four-page form. And those who have received compensation either through the so-called Hardship Fund or the Article 2 Fund, fill out a simple, two-page form, since other information about them already exists in a computer database. The shorter forms have been mailed out to thousands of Holocaust survivors.

The applications employ an icy bureaucratese, categorizing claimants according to whether they endured a concentration camp, ghetto or labour camp. "Please check box if subjected to medical experiments," the documents curtly inquire.

Frieda Rosenberg, 76, was born in Czechoslovakia and was a slave at Auschwitz and Bergen-Belsen, doing construction work, digging bunkers and toiling in a chemical factory, seven days a week, for at least 18 hours a day. "We got a little piece of toast or bread a day," she says. "There was no rest."

Her husband, born in Radom, Poland, was shipped to Ukraine to build roads for six months, then sent back to Radom's Jewish ghetto, where he did "all kinds of dirty work – digging, cleaning streets, you name it," until his liberation in 1944.

"There is no amount of money for that labour we did," says Mrs. Rosenberg flatly.

Organizers note that survivors can be confused or put off by the paperwork. For some, completing the forms can be emotionally taxing, as it forces them to re-live terrible times. Each table in the room that hosts the clinic has a box of tissues on it.

Barak says quite a few survivors also inquire about dormant Swiss bank accounts. That issue is being handled by the United Restitution Organization (URO).

All slave labour compensation forms are notarized. Claimants then mail them to an address in Fredericksburg, Va. Anyone who was alive on Feb. 15, 1999 is eligible for compensation. After that date, direct heirs are eligible.

The clinics are part of a worldwide campaign to find and compensate as many former slaves as possible.

The New York-based Conference on Jewish Material Claims Against Germany, known as the Claims Conference, is co-ordinating efforts in 40 countries and eight languages.

Applicants do not pay a fee. The deadline for submitting forms is Aug. 11, 2001. Documents may be downloaded at www.claimscon.org but they may not be submitted by e-mail.

The community has also set up a telephone hotline: 416-631-5825.

'New world' opens to deaf children in Israel

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — When Nathan and Jozie Eisner made aliyah in 1990, they opened up a new world for deaf children in Israel.

Together with another family, the Eisners founded A.V. Israel, a non-profit organization of professionals and parents of hearing impaired children, who are committed to the auditory-verbal approach of teaching deaf children.

The Eisners have a 24-year-old daughter who is profoundly deaf – she is now the mother of triplets – and a son, 21, who is severely deaf. A third son has normal hearing.

"When our children were very young, we met a woman in Toronto who told us we could teach them to speak, and we became involved with Voice for Hearing Impaired Children," said Nathan Eisner, here recently to raise awareness about A.V. Israel.

It was through Voice for Hearing Impaired Children, he said, that they met Warren Estabrooks, a certified auditory verbal therapist.

"Our children trained with him, and we learned how to train our children in the auditory-verbal method, which emphasizes early diagnosis and advanced audiological rehabilitation, and inclusion of the child in the hearing world."

The method involves constantly surrounding the child with sound, he said.

"By doing this, the child's auditory sensory nerves become stimulated, and they learn to process the sounds. It is a big commitment, and whoever is close to the family has to become involved; the child must be continually stimulated. It is a lot of work, but the results speak for themselves."

His daughter, who lagged behind in school when she first entered, was caught up to her grade level by the time she was in Grade 3, he said. "When we left for Israel she was in high school. She did well, and she went on to study in college."

When the Eisners met Eli and Elaine Matlow Tal-El – parents of profoundly deaf twins – in Israel, they decided similar work was needed there, he said.

"There are centres for deaf children, but there was no such thing as auditory verbal therapy. We decided to start an organization in 1994. Children in Israel deserve the same chance as children everywhere else."

Today, said Eisner, an accountant by profession, A.V. Israel has a board of 16 people, and there are about 200 families involved. "Some people watch television; this is what I do in my spare time."

In their effort to provide services throughout Israel, said Eisner, they have opened two auditory-verbal centres which provide therapy, house a library of materials, serve as a training centre for new professionals, offer lectures and workshops to parents and professionals, and provide consultation, assessment services and support to families.

A book has been written by parents, for parents, on the subject of hearing loss and the auditory-verbal option. There is also a video for parents and professionals that describes the process of learning language through the auditory-verbal option, and a quarterly newsletter which reaches over 200 families.

Every centre in Israel that deals with deaf children receives copies of the book and the video, said Eisner.

A.V. Israel is also involved in a national forum for the hearing impaired, and a lobbying committee for integrating special needs children in mainstream educational frameworks, he said.

"Over the last few years, we have seen more and more families express interest in an auditory-verbal education for their deaf children.

"In order to make that option accessible to all families we need such things as educational materials in Hebrew and Arabic available for home use; educational programs for professionals; a scholarship program for families with limited resources; and empowerment programs for parents to help them meet the challenge of raising a deaf child."

Their mandate, he said, is to "educate the people. We want parents in Canada to know what we are all about, as well. Everyone needs to know that their children have this opportunity, and then they can decide what to do. We brought that choice to Israel.

"Children should be able to do and be whatever they'd like. The whole world should be open to them."

The diagnosis of his own children, he said, "changed our whole family. Things we thought were important before suddenly became trivial. Something like that changes your priorities in life."

Jewish Women International of Canada was recently named Agency of the Year by Beth Tikvah Congregation's social action committee. JWI honoured by Beth Tikvah

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Jewish Women International of Canada has been named agency of the year by Beth Tikvah Synagogue's social action committee.

The award, presented annually at a social action Shabbat, honours agencies whose efforts have benefited the local, national, and/or international community.

Past honorees include Jewish Family and Child Services, Jews for Judaism, Jewish National Fund, Jewish Immigrant Aid Services, Reena Foundation, Baycrest Centre for Geriatric Care, Task Force on Syrian Jewry and National Council of Jewish Women.

The day before the presentation, Ken Stewart, chair of the social action committee, said that one of the committee's mandates "other than to do good work, is to honour others who do good work.

"JWI/C is a community resource organization that strengthens the lives of women, children and families, and perpetuates Jewish values through education, advocacy and action."

For over 70 years, he said, JWI/C has been providing direct services, education and action in Canadian communities. Confronting spousal abuse, family violence and youth violence are priority commitments for the organization. We thank [them] for propelling these troubling issues into the forefront of public awareness," said Stewart.

A bone marrow donor information meeting co-ordinated by Beth Tikvah and JWI/C attracted about 1,200 people, he said.

"We had learned that people get caught up in the emotion of wanting to be a donor, but did not realize what it involved; it is a big commitment. As a result of that meeting, however, over 500 people signed up."

Another joint project, said Shelly Altman, a member of the social action committee, was a forum about violence against women.

Penny Krowitz, executive director of JWI/C, said that her organization is "passionate about what we do, and we are flattered when someone outside of our circle acknowledges it.

"We have a great deal in common with Beth Tikvah's social action committee, and it makes it more of an honour because the committee also does good work."

Paula Mittleman, president of JWI/C, said that social action is the defining feature of Beth Tikvah Congregation, and social action as well as education and awareness are the driving forces of JWI/C.

"To be honoured by a group such as the social comittee is particularly flattering as we share these goals," she said.

Precious possibilities of two dimensions

Canadians appreciate and even value greatly, those occasions when our leaders and public officials speak their minds honestly, without guile or calculation. Sincerity ranks far above consistency in the hierarchy of decision-making considerations; even as integrity is always a greater virtue than expediency.

But then there is the matter of the substance of the opinions and the beliefs that are sincerity's spontaneous offspring. Sometimes sincerity is simply a lack of self-control and integrity, merely a bad excuse for taunting out a tirade. For that is how most observers, even in Quebec, preferred to characterize the most recent public statements by Quebec Premier Bernard Landry on the subjects of Canada and federalism.

In an interview last week, Landry offered the assessment that "Canada was of no use," and that it had been "disastrous" for Quebec. This rather brusque and brutish characterization of the rest of the country appears to be fully and intricately woven into the deep pattern of Landry's innermost thoughts on Canada. It was of a piece with his infamous "red rag" comment some weeks earlier concerning the Canadian flag. The outrage expressed by the majority of the Quebec public was so great that he "corrected" those colourful remarks the next day. But the effort was too transparent and the embarrassment too widespread for the attempted remediation to have done any good.

In an article that appeared last week in the Globe and Mail three days after the Landry tirade, Stephane Dion, the federal minister of intergovernmental affairs, responded to Landry's mischievous mischaracterizations. It was appropriate that Dion did so. He wrote not only as a representative of the government of Canada, but as a Quebecer as well.

The article was reasoned, temperate and factual. After an extensive rebuttal, item by item, of Landry's dubious assertions, Dion concluded: "Quebec is neither the spoiled child nor the victim of the federation. It receives its fair share of federal spending as a province somewhat less wealthy than the Canadian average… Obviously Quebec is a nation in the French sense of the word, that is, a collectivity with its own sense of history and cultural references. But this culture includes our Canadian dimension, and to renounce that would be to give up a significant part of what it is that makes us Quebecers."

In this respect, Dion speaks on behalf of the majority of Quebecers who, in two referenda, have already indicated they are unwilling to give up "that significant part" of their Quebec identity. (Our emphasis.) The polls conducted since the last referendum indicate the majority is growing. Unfortunately for them and for the rest of Canada, Landry and his separatist colleagues are incapable of seeing, let alone understanding, the precious possibilities in the interweaving of these two dimensions – Canadian and Québécois – into one identity.

LET OUR PEOPLE GO…

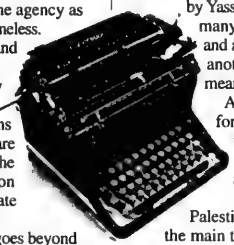
JF&CS and the homeless

In his recent story about a homeless Jew (CJN, March 15), Ron Csillag quotes a homeless man as saying, "Except for two or three lunches, they [JF&CS] haven't [helped]. If the Jewish community can find me another place to live, I'd jump at the chance."

This description of JF&CS's involvement does not fit with the phone call I received from the same homeless man just two weeks ago when he thanked me and indicated great appreciation for the assistance the agency had provided.

In a more recent conversation (following Csillag's article), the same man describes Simon Kalkstein, the JF&CS social worker dealing with the case, as "extremely decent, a real mentsch, who has devoted a great deal of time advocating to find appropriate housing and support services for me."

In an accompanying sidebar titled "JF&CS Responds to the Problem," Csillag again depicts the agency as being unresponsive to the needs of the homeless. Nothing could be farther from the truth and from the facts.



To begin with, there are very few Jewish homeless actually on the street. This very small number (Csillag mentions five people) of Jewish individuals who are brought to our attention or who contact the agency after hours on weekdays or on weekends are provided with an immediate response.

However, our definition of homeless goes beyond those few individuals living on the streets or in shelters to include "those people at risk of becoming homeless." This definition corresponds to the recommendation in the Anne Golden Task Force on Homelessness. Our approach is one of early intervention and prevention.

During the year 2000, JF&CS helped 127 people avoid eviction by paying their rent. An additional 60 people were assisted to pay outstanding gas or hydro bills. Funds for these services are made possible through the financial assistance program supported by UJA FEDERATION.

Csillag raises some worthwhile concerns with his article but loses credibility when he accuses JF&CS of being "shamed into setting up a task force on the Jewish homeless." JF&CS has never had to be shamed into responding to serious social concerns within our community. The agency has a proven track record of assisting and supporting the most vulnerable and disenfranchised of Toronto's Jewish community.

Jobs for Conservative Women rabbis

I was pleased to read your article about the conference for Conservative women rabbis held in New York in January (CJN, Feb. 15). The writer suggests that career options for women rabbis are limited in Canada because of the dearth of Conservative egalitarian congregations. While this may be the situation in Ontario and Quebec, there are egalitarian synagogues with rabbinic positions available in Edmonton, Winnipeg, Saskatoon, Victoria and Richmond, B.C.

I cannot speak for the other synagogues but I would urge Conservative rabbis (male or female) to contact the search committee at Edmonton Beth Shalom.

Slogan means annihilation of Israel

The article, "Montreal Jews, Palestinians stage weekly peace vigil" (CJN, March 8), could have been written by Yasser Arafat himself. I don't remember how many times I have heard the phrase "a just and a lasting peace." The "right of return" is another beautiful slogan, but translated, it means the annihilation of the State of Israel.

As a former Montrealer living in Israel for the last 25 years, it is difficult for me to imagine that there are Jews who would adhere to the program of "self-annihilation," but I guess I'm wrong.

Come on, get with it. Arafat and his Palestinian Authority have been, and still are, the main terrorist organization that Israel has to contend with. Arafat's signature isn't worth the paper it is written on and the agreements made at Oslo and Camp David, and the attempted agreements made at Wye should be proof enough.

I still believe in peace, but not with Arafat and not with those who would destroy Israel by using the Palestinian refugees as fodder in their campaigning.

CHAT scores high in literacy test

We are very pleased to advise that CHAT Grade 10 students obtained an overall success rate of 94 percent in the recent Ontario Secondary School G10 Literacy Test Results. The result confirms the high academic standards of the Toronto Jewish School system – including, of course, our feeder schools, which is where the basis of literacy is established.

In fact, only one percent of the students failed both parts of the test. It should be understood, however, that of the 338 students who completed the test, there are a number of recent arrivals from overseas whose English, while rapidly improving, is not yet at a high level.

Perspectives

In Search of a New Zionism

This article is the second of two parts. Part one was published last week.

By DEREK PENSLAR

Can Israel revive secular Zionism? With a century of Promethean generational rebellion and a struggle to create a secular Hebrew, as opposed to Jewish, identity, Israel has yielded to hedonistic consumerism on the one hand and religious zealotry on the other. The country is experiencing the global phenomenon identified by political scientist Benjamin Barber as the bifurcation of society between "McWorld" (soulless, capitalist consumerism) and "Jihad" (anti-Western tribalism and identity politics). The divisions are deep and wide.

Powerful images of Zionism: Theodor Herzl in Basel.

The purely secular ethos that inspired the first generations of Zionist pioneers is no longer viable. That ethos relied on the dynamic of a permanent revolution, of a society mobilized to gather exiles, settle the land and battle with the enemy. Early Israeli society was dominated by collective social units such as the trade union, the political party and the youth movement. The public sphere overpowered the private.

Today's Israel, by contrast, is an advanced industrial society, with the deteriorating public sphere and increased individualism that usually accompanies rising affluence. Western material and popular culture have overwhelmed the country like a tidal wave. At the same time, the pervasive threats of terrorism and war create hungers that material prosperity cannot satisfy. Growing numbers of secular Israelis are searching for connections with their Jewish past. Although the unenlightened Orthodoxy which dominates Israeli religious culture impedes this process, there are glimmering signs of rapprochement between secular Israelis and Jewish observance and textual study.

How would the founders of the State of Israel view this development? They were rebels, secular and iconoclastic, but rebels from observant homes, steeped in Judaic learning. This confluence of tradition and radicalism made possible secular Zionism's blend of humanism and Hebraism. No doubt, David Ben-Gurion and his comrades would be dismayed by Israel's crass consumerism, its yearning for the flesh-pots of America and its devolving martial spirit. They would be appalled by the growth and political clout of the anti-Zionist ultra-Orthodox and the ultra-Zionist, right-wing Orthodox.

Yet they would probably realize that their aggressive secularism had done much to create this nightmarish landscape. Berl Katznelson would ruefully recall words from an essay of 1936: "For every generation will rebel against its elders – this is natural – but if a generation disconnects itself from its predecessor so that the [former] generation becomes as if it never was – this is a special curse in our annals of rebuke... For a generation that does not recognize its father does not know itself. It does not know what it inherited and that against which it rebelled. And in this our shame is greater than that of any other movement."

I believe that, despite all the seachanges that Israel and Israelis have experienced in recent decades, there are certain points upon which a wide spectrum of Jews, in Israel and the Diaspora, from Left to Right, from post-Zionist intellectual to staunchly Zionist ideologue, can all agree. These points can become the basis for what I call "Neo-Zionism."

First and foremost, the original Zionist project was legitimate and rational. Theodor Herzl's diagnosis of European anti-Semitism as endemic and ineradicable was fundamentally sound. His assessment of the perilous political state and economic dysfunction of East European Jewry was valid as well. Although Herzl exaggerated the degree of Jewish assimilation, he was right to criticize the vapidity of Western Jewish culture which, without Zionism, would be in an even weaker position than it is today. (Even the recent rebellion against Zionism, or at least against the organized Israeli bureaucracy, among American Jewish philanthropists is fueled by an ethno-religious revival that owes much to Zionist influences.) In an age of nationalism and secularization, there was no alternative to the creation of a secular Hebraic culture. And there is no question that the Jewish State could have arisen anywhere but in Eretz Yisrael, the only geographic location which could inspire world Jewry as a whole.

Neo-Zionism would recognize the necessity of Jewish nationalism, celebrate its accomplishments, and acknowledge that Israel's destiny profoundly affects Jews the world over. It would neither conceal nor belabour the imperfection of Zionism's leaders and ideologues. Most important – and in this respect it would differ sharply from its classical predecessor – neo-Zionism would seek continuity with the entire Jewish past and with the Jewish religious tradition as well.

In his celebrated essay of 1882, "What is a Nation?", French scholar Ernest Renan observed that "to forget... and to get one's history wrong are essential factors in the making of a nation." Whereas Renan wrote of the unifying power of collective amnesia and a selective, manipulative exploitation of history within a national body, neo-Zionism would call for collective and inclusive remembering. Linear memory, the positing of neat continuities and rifts between eras, has been all too often the slave of nationalist ideology. What we need is lateral memory, accepting of contradiction, overlap and ambiguity.

The result, I believe, will be a more complex but also a more resilient Zionist identity. It combines a visceral sense of Israeli peoplehood (now several generations old) with a growing awareness of the Jewish cultural and historical heritage, unburdened by anti-clerical ideological freight. As fits the ambiguities of the new millennium, neo-Zionism is far more nuanced and less monolithic and manipulative than its predecessor. It is eclectic without being disingenuously selective; it is ironical without being cynical. Its appeal to history is underlaid by compassion, not self-aggrandizement. It allows us to hear the voices of many different kinds of Jews and of the Arabs with and among whom Israel is destined to dwell.

Respecting the elderly

A recent personal experience has recalled for me a verse in the 19th chapter of Leviticus: "You shall rise before a grey head and respect the aged." Like many biblical injunctions, it was a response to problems in the time when it was first promulgated, but since it concerns human behaviour in general, it applies to every age. The commandment to respect the aged is found in the Torah because too many people did not observe it then, nor do they today.

Rabbi Gunther Plaut in Toronto

I regret to say that when I travel by public transportation I often encounter this disrespect. Frequently parents sit right next to their youngsters but do not encourage them to give an older person a seat. For not only children are discourteous; adults may suffer from the same lack of moral education. Not long ago, a young man whose dress suggested that he was an observant Jew, left a store two steps ahead of me and slammed the door right in my face. When I recovered my balance and caught up with him I confronted him and said, "Doesn't the Torah teach you respect for the aged?" To make my point, I quoted the verse in Hebrew. He looked at me with some surprise but was not in the mood of being instructed in Torah. He spit on the ground and said, "Goy!" — no doubt referring to my uncovered head — and stormed away. Remorse or even an "excuse me" was apparently not part of his lifestyle.

There is a wide-ranging impression that we live in a time that when the relationship between younger and older people is rather poor and much worse than in earlier days. It is therefore well to remember that in Ecclesiastes (7:10) we are reminded that it is unwise to think of the former days as having been better than ours. Thus, the prophet Malachi, who lived around the end of the fifth century before the Common Era, describes what in his vision will be the major achievement of the Messiah. Says Malachi: "On that great day… he will turn the hearts of the fathers to their children and the hearts of the children to their parents." In other words, the prophet considered the conflict between the generations a major problem that needed messianic repair. To him, it was apparently the central problem of his time.

As in so many other aspects of life, the biblical teaching goes far beyond its own age and reaches into the future. Our days need repair and I am afraid they still will need it in days to come.

The future of North American Jewry

On March 11, Vancouver's Jewish community was one of dozens of communities to take part in an important new initiative: the telecasting by satellite of a live discussion from the 92nd Street Y in New York City. This kallah, or gathering, was one of three to be held prior to Passover. It echoes the ancient tradition of communal study once held regularly before Passover (and before the High Holy Days), a time when ordinary Jews would gather to listen to the debates between scholars at the great academies.

Jean M. Gerber in Vancouver

As preparation for the holidays, this brilliant and singular invention allowed people whose lives the rest of the year were filled with toil to enjoy the luxury of learning. The first broadcast chose an ambitious topic, no less than The Future of North American Jewry, and asked Alan Dershowitz, Anne Roiphe and Dennis Prager to think out loud about this eternal subject.

While the topic is breathtakingly huge, the three began courteously, but predictably, they soon bogged down in defending their respective positions: for Dershowitz, the right of individuals to defend against any state-sponsored religious observance; for Roiphe, the power of the secular Jewish mind; and for Prager, the need for traditional observance and conservative politics.

They did agree that this is a golden age for Jews in North America. Antisemitism is at a low ebb, and has become the province not of the powerful but of the scum of society. Day schools flourish. Jews can enter any university, profession or calling without restriction. They can join the clubs that less than a generation ago barred their entry.

Unfortunately, the panel was not really discussing the future of North American Jews so much as the present state of our communities. I think they left out many things that will contribute to its future.

They offered the need to educate children in Judaism and learn Hebrew (leading one to note that both Noam Chomsky and the Satmar Rebbe know Hebrew and both hate the State of Israel).

But I would offer two issues they didn't address: one, the presence among us of so many converts to Judaism, "Jews by Choice;" and two, the tension, which they conveyed by their discussion but did not name, caused by fractures between the Orthodox and non-Orthodox worlds.

In regard to the former issue, I realize that tradition teaches us not to make distinctions between a person voluntarily joining the Jewish people and one born to Judaism. Yet, had I been on that panel, I would have insisted that the speakers acknowledge the great change that has taken place in less than half a century.

In the dark days immediately after World War II, who would have predicted that 50 years later, Jews by choice would be leading synagogues and JCCs, sending their children to day schools, becoming spiritual leaders and kashrut supervisors, and represented in every denomination? Who would imagine that people of African, Chinese and Japanese ancestry would join former Baptists, Anglicans and Catholic priests in the community of Israel? These vivid stories presage a change in the way we live as Jews.

And what can one say about the overt tension – indeed hostility – between the denominations of contemporary Judaism? In Israel, this tension has led to heartbreak for many immigrants seeking to find a place within Am Yisrael. In North America, it has led to diatribes fired from all sides, and surly, simmering hostility to the achievements of each group, to the detriment of the whole.

What will these phenomena bring? Prophecy has departed from Israel, so we simply do not know. One thing is clear: Thousands of non-Jews have been brought closer to the Jewish community as their relatives live a visible Jewish life. Jews cannot remain "the other" if our children's grandparents see them bar and bat-mitzvahed and travel with them to Israel, learning firsthand about Judaism and the Jewish people. On the other hand, where will our communities be if we cannot agree to disagree, but progress, as we have, from op-ed pieces to physical attacks on non-Orthodox?

That none of the three at our kallah thought to point out the increasing number of converts or the internal discord as facets of our future saddened me. I look forward to the kallah that will discuss these issues as they influence the future of North American Jewry.

Life in Edmonton and Northern Alberta

My friend and associate dean Brian Mazer often says that much of what he knows about leadership, he learned from his experiences on the board of the Northwest Canada region of the B'nai Brith Youth Organization. My own youth movement experiences tell me he is right. During my teenage years, I served on the regional va'ad (executive) of Atlantic Young Judaea.

Bruce Elman in Windsor

I learned a great deal during those years. Whatever meagre skills I possess were nurtured by my Young Judaea experience. I particularly benefited from the guidance of a tall, cigar-smoking, erudite professional who served as our executive director – Uri Rosenzweig. I should say that I am not sure Uri remembers those days as fondly as I do.

We were, undoubtedly, a group of brash, rather sophomoric, high school students, who probably took advantage of his goodwill and patience more than we should have. It was not until much later that I realized how much I had learned from Uri. Student leaders often do not appreciate the adult professionals who work with them.

After I worked with Uri at Camp Kadimah, our paths parted. He later moved to Edmonton, where he became the executive director of the Jewish Community Council (the forerunner to the federation) and the United Jewish Appeal. By the time I became involved in the Edmonton community, however, Uri was a volunteer.

Now in his 70s, Uri recently put the crowning touch on his years of professional and volunteer service to the Jewish community. A limited edition book, The First Century of Jewish Life in Edmonton and Northern Alberta 1893-1993: The First and Second Generations, published by the Jewish Archives and Historical Society of Edmonton and Northern Alberta (JAHSENA), is the creation of the compiler and editor, Uri Rosenzweig.

On my last trip to Edmonton, I acquired number 511 of this limited edition. I was immediately captivated by the rich contents of this 300-page volume.

Although a coffee table book in size, format and style, it is not just a "pretty book." Rather, it provides an interesting glimpse into the history of the first century of Jewish life in Edmonton and Northern Alberta. In his preface, Uri notes that this volume is the only book about the Jews of Edmonton and Northern Alberta between 1893-1993, and the most comprehensive record.

Yet, in the view of the editor, it is still incomplete and flawed. Uri prefers to characterize it as a "postcard view" of the people, institutions and organizations. And, indeed, it is postcard-like. Except for the concluding section which contains family histories, most of the book is filled with snap shots accompanied by short captions. They are much like this: "We went to a lovely (choose one) dedication or dinner or wedding. The whole board or congregation or family was there. Sorry you couldn't make it."

In fairness, some entries are more extensive, and each section is preceded by an overview of the history of that particular school, shul, community organization or agency. To me, the book made for exotic reading – as if one had stumbled upon some old postcards that had been sent from abroad. How could you not be fascinated by them!

But something more fundamental comes to the reader through these photos.

Those Jews who came this region of Canada arrived with little but their faith in God and commitment to Judaism. It was a hard life. And yet those pioneers succeeded in creating Jewish organizations and institutions so that they could build a meaningful Jewish life for their children and grandchildren. They succeeded, and we should always remember the sacrifices they made for us. We should not be the generation that abandons their "project."

In the end, I believe the book will accomplish what the editor and the historical society set out to do – to stimulate greater interest in and support for efforts to preserve the past history of the Jews and their Jewish institutions and organizations in Edmonton and Northern Alberta. For this they deserve our congratulations and our gratitude. To Uri and the Board of JAHSENA: Yasher koach and mazel tov!

The Kirshner File

Armand Hammer, Lenin's favourite capitalist

Armand Hammer, a formidable businessman and philanthropist who died a decade ago, was the stuff of myths and legends. A confidant of every Soviet leader since Vladimir Lenin, he was the president of Occidental Petroleum, one of the largest corporations in the United States. Hammer was a flamboyant figure who carefully nurtured his public image for nearly 70 years, concealing, as it turns out, an integral aspect of his persona.

Sheldon Kirshner in Toronto

Edward Jay Epstein, in a sobering book entitled Dossier: The Secret History of Armand Hammer (Random House), comes to bury, not to praise, him in this muckraking volume. It is quite a page-turner, a story of calculated deceit which purportedly sets the record straight about this icon of American capitalism.

He was born in New York City in 1901, the first son of Rose and Julius Hammer, a couple whose ancestral roots were in Russia. Being irreligious, the family named Armand after the symbol of the left-wing Socialist Labour party (the arm and the hammer), of which they were fervent members.

A medical doctor by training, Julius was an entrepreneur at heart. When Armand was still a young man, Julius was already the proprietor of a thriving wholesale business which supplied skin creams and herbal medicines to drugstores. Despite his affluence, Julius was politically radical and an ardent supporter of the Bolshevik revolution in Russia. Indeed, he was the financial advisor of the first Soviet diplomatic office in New York City, known as the Russian Soviet Bureau.

Julius' fortunes plummeted in 1920 when he was convicted of first-degree manslaughter in a botched abortion and sentenced to 3½ to 12 years of hard labour at Sing Sing State Prison. While Julius languished in jail, Armand cut short his medical studies at Columbia University and seized an opportunity his father could not avail himself of. The fledgling Soviet government, in dire need of investment capital, invited the Hammers to bid on a mineral concession. In 1921, Armand met with Lenin in Moscow. Hoping to stimulate trade between the Soviet Union and the United States, Lenin offered him an asbestos mine. He accepted with alacrity. It was the beginning of Hammer's long commercial relationship with the Soviet Union.

In addition to returning home with a lucrative contract to develop the asbestos industry, Epstein claims, Hammer smuggled the equivalent of $600,000 in Soviet funds to Comintern agents in the United States. The Comintern was an organization whose goal was to engage in espionage and to foment revolution abroad.

Hammer, however, never identified himself with his father's politics and took care not to be associated with Communist causes. Instead he plunged headlong into a cause which would consume him for the rest of his days: the calculating pursuit of money. Hammer, the first American concessionaire in the Soviet Union, was a ruthless operator whose sympathy for workers was ephemeral. Threatened by a strike at the asbestos concession, he enlisted the Soviet secret police to suppress it. So much for the brotherhood of man.

After Lenin's death and Joseph Stalin's accession to power, Hammer expanded his interests in the Soviet Union. His holdings included a pencil plant – the only foreign-owned manufacturer of products for the domestic and foreign markets – and a Ford Motor Company agency.

Yet, by 1930, Hammer was out in the cold, following Stalin's decision to end foreign concessions. Bouncing back, he reincarnated himself as an art dealer, specializing in Russian jewelry, antiques and bric-a-brac (including looted Torah scrolls). World War II wrecked his business, but he was hardly cowed. Not one to be discouraged by adversity, the savvy Hammer turned his attention to the liquor trade. His firm, United Distillers of America, with plants in nine U.S. states, blossomed into the biggest privately owned distiller in the United States.

Subsequently, Hammer acquired shares in a moribund oil company, Occidental Petroleum, based in Los Angeles. By 1961, its shares had appreciated more than 6,000-fold, Hammer having transformed it into an international powerhouse. Though he owned less than one percent of its stock, he ran it like a fiefdom, using it as a corporate treasury for his philanthropic activities.

In 1966, the Arab Oil Review published a profile about him, highlighting his Jewish background and his fund-raising efforts on behalf of Israel (which Epstein fails to elaborate upon). These disclosures were potentially damaging, since Occidental had wells in Libya, a member of the Arab League. Suspecting that a rival oil company was trying to undermine his position in that country, Hammer not only heatedly denied these assertions, but actually changed his religion.

According to Epstein, he joined a Unitarian church in Los Angeles and asked its minister to write a letter identifying him as a Christian. The ploy worked, and Hammer continued doing business with Libya after the 1969 coup which brought Muammar Khadafi to the fore.

In the meantime, Hammer had reingratiated himself in the Soviet Union, which regarded him as Lenin's favourite capitalist. Never less than shrewd, Hammer had invested in a fertilizer complex valued at $20 billion and representing roughly 90 percent of all foreign investment in the Soviet Union.

By 1978, he was the recognized channel through which U.S. corporations sought business opportunities there. On Hammer's 80th birthday, Leonid Brezhnev, the Communist party leader, awarded him the Lenin Order of Friendship, a prize no other foreign businessman had ever received.

Armand Hammer at age 54

At Brezhnev's behest, Hammer undertook a mission to relieve pressure on the besieged Soviet army fighting Islamic forces in Afghanistan. He shuttled around the world on his private plane trying to find a solution, but to no avail. It should be noted, although Epstein makes no reference to it, that Moscow's anti-Semitic and anti-Zionist policies had no bearing whatsoever on his close relationship with the Soviet leadership.

Hammer's relations with Israel are given short shrift by Epstein. But the few pages he devotes to the topic expose Hammer as an arch opportunist.

Having all but previously shunned Israel for fear of offending Libya, Hammer made his first public trip to the Jewish state in 1984. The ostensible purpose of his trip was to rescue Menachem Begin, the former prime minister, from a life-threatening urologic blockage. Hammer was accompanied by a top American urologist, who performed the required surgery. By way of gratitude, Begin agreed to sponsor Hammer for a Nobel Peace Prize. Hammer thought he deserved it because he had tirelessly promoted detente between the United States and the Soviet Union. But the Nobel committee passed on his candidacy.

Be that as it may, Hammer used his meeting with Begin to invest in Israel. Yet his quest to establish an aircraft industry in Israel failed. He had hoped to build one in co-operation with the Soviet Union and the United States and in league with Israeli and Canadian businessmen Shaul Eisenberg and Albert Reichmann.

Similarly, Hammer fell short of formally returning to Judaism. With only weeks to live, after learning that he had inoperable cancer, he decided to renew his connection with Judaism by having a bar mitzvah. But he died before the ceremony could ever be performed.

Mummifying Lenin

Millions of visitors, including myself, have filed solemnly past the granite tomb of Vladimir Ilyich Lenin – the founder of the Soviet Union – in Red Square.

After his death in 1924, two scientists were assigned to preserve his remains. One of them, a Jew, was Boris Zbarsky, the assistant director of Moscow's Institute of Biochemistry. In 1934, Zbarsky's son, Ilya, a biochemist, joined the team in charge of maintaining the mummy.

In an intriguing book, Lenin's Embalmers (Raincoast), Ilya Zbarsky reveals the story behind the embalming. Call it a curious footnote in history.

When Zbarsky's father initially examined the corpse, the first signs of decomposition had already set in. The body was dipped into a secret balsam solution and then prettified. Eventually, Boris Zbarsky was put in charge of the laboratory responsible for preserving Lenin in a presentable state.

At the end of World War II, the Zbarskys were honored by the Soviet government. Boris was awarded the Order of Lenin and granted the title of Hero of Socialist Labour, while Ilya received the Order of the Red Flag of Labour. In 1952, however, Boris was arrested, accused of being an agent of " international Zionism," and imprisoned for two years. Ilya was fired shortly afterwards.

The author, a resident of Moscow, now condemns embalmment as "a barbaric and anachronistic practice," and claims that Lenin should have been buried.

It remains to be seen what Russian President Vladimir Putin will do with Lenin.

Jewish Life

A life embedded in history

A Life in the 20th Century, Innocent Beginnings, 1917-1950,* by Arthur M. Schlesinger Jr., Houghton Mifflin Company, $39.95

Books
Bernard Baskin

The first 33 years of renowned historian and political activist Arthur Schlesinger's life were filled with excitement, achievement and encounters with colourful movers and shakers. In this, the first volume of his contemplated two-volume memoir, he sets it all down with style, wit, anecdote, historical perspective and a deft blending of personal detail against the background of epic events.

The three great issues of these pre-World War II years were the conflict in the United States between isolationism and interventionism, the struggle with Nazism and the persistent and unrelenting battle with communism.

The isolationist American First movement was widely popular. Charles Lindbergh charged that three groups were driving the United States into war: the New Dealers, the British and the Jews. He fulminated: "Instead of agitating for war, the Jewish groups in this country should be opposing it in every possible way, for they will be among the first to feel its consequences... Their greatest danger to this country lies in their ownership and influence in our motion pictures, our press, our radio and our government."

Opposition to the war was widespread. In August 1941, the U.S. House of Representatives passed the extension of the draft by a single vote, thereby barely preventing the disintegration of the American armed forces.

Schlesinger, whose father and grandfather were Jewish, but whose mother and grandmother were not, has much to say of Jewish interest. He defends President Franklin D. Roosevelt against those who accuse him of betraying Jews. He writes: "Actually, FDR was probably the most pro-Jewish of all American presidents. No president up to his time had so many Jews in his inner circle or appointed so many to high office. Opponents called it the 'Jew Deal.' And FDR well knew how strong anti-Semitism was in America during the Great Depression. The Swedish economist Gunnar Myrdal observed in his great work An American Dilemma that anti-Semitism in America 'probably was somewhat stronger than in Germany before the Nazi regime.'"

In the 1980s and 1990s, a furious controversy erupted over the supposed failure of the American and British governments to do more to save the Jews of Europe. The author believes that the Nazi Final Solution was just incomprehensible, even when some facts and figures were known to most observers.

Schlesinger writes that many refugees were predisposed to disbelieve the reports of genocide. "Did the Nazis persecute the Jews? Yes, of course, we knew that... But gas chambers? Ovens?... Unbelievable. Unimaginable."

The Pocket Guide of Germany, issued by the War Department for the instruction of the army of occupation, did not mention the death camps, he says.

Schlesinger emerged from his academic studies at Harvard and Cambridge University during the political and literary ferment of the '30s, serving a stint overseas with the Office of Strategic Services. His influential book The Vital Centre (1948), advocated a middle-of-the-road course between the excesses of unbridled leftism and hidebound conservatism.

Schlesinger has written an engaging memoir that is elegant and readable. It combines intellectual and political history with an appealing autobiography, in a stimulating journey through the first half of the 20th century.

Apologizing? That's the easy part

By WILLIAM BEDFORD

Guest Voice

Now that the Pope has apologized for the sins committed against Jews in the name of the Catholic Church, and the German Lutheran Church has followed suit, it's expected that other Christian denominations will also seek forgiveness for their sins of anti-Semitism.

A blanket apology for past wrongs is about all that any group can hope for, since no church, or government for that matter, can be expected to itemize every act of injustice committed by their predecessors over the centuries. The Jews, however, are one group that deserves a special apology from all of Christendom for the pain and suffering inflicted on them by Christians ever since some long-forgotten gentile first called them Christ-killers two millennia ago.

Peter Gumpel, a German Jesuit priest, recently said in an interview on CBC-TV's The National, "It is a fact that the Jews have killed Christ. This is an undeniable historical fact."

What if it is? No thinking person would blame anyone for the "sins" of their parents, let alone the "sins" of their ancestors. Life is tough enough without that burden. Besides, if the crucifixion of Jesus Christ was part of a divine plan, as Christians believe, what choice did those ancient Jews have?

Branded by Christians as "God killers," Jews have, at various times, been expelled from Spain, barred from England, and persecuted in Poland, Ukraine and Russia. There are few places in all of Christendom where the Jewish people have not been on the short end of the Christian bigotry stick. Ethnic hatred has always been with us in one form or another. The ancient Greeks and Romans embraced slavery. The Norman conquerors despised the Saxons so much they prohibited them from learning French. The Pilgrims who settled the American colonies seeking freedom of worship had no qualms about denying freedom of conscience to anyone who disagreed with their own narrow version of Christianity.

Throughout history, virtually every ethnic and religious group has been subjected to the intolerance of the ruling majority. Things have changed little over the years; look at such places as Indonesia and the former Yugoslavia.

Nevertheless, the Jews are a special case, attacked by Christians for no reason other than their rejection of Jesus, himself a Jew, as their saviour. The refusal by Canada, among other nations, to admit Jewish refugees from Hitler's Germany lent encouragement to the sub-humans who targeted the whole Jewish people for extermination in what has become known as the Holocaust.

Even in these so called enlightened times, anti-Semitism continues through the vandalism of synagogues and Jewish cemeteries, and through the neo-Nazis who, despite all evidence to the contrary, make a career of trying to convince the world that the Holocaust never happened. These so-called Christians blame the Jews for everything from the bubonic plague to World War I. Quebec separatist Yves Michaud even had the temerity to accuse Canadian Jews of committing the shocking crime of voting against the break-up of their country.

Apologizing for past wrongs committed by churches and governments against every people from native Canadians to Scottish Highlanders is the easy part. The hard part, which is the only part that matters, is to cease and desist from hurtful actions against others just because they happen to differ from us in ethnicity, religion or sex. If we ever get around to treating others as we would to be treated ourselves, there will be no need for future leaders to ask forgiveness from, or for, any of us.

The hunt for Kosher wines

By MARK MIETKIEWICZ

As Passover approaches, we continue our hunt for the best kosher wines on the Internet. We start off in Israel. Daniel Rogov gives an excellent and amusing overview in Israeli Cuisine and Wine [www.travelnet.co.il/israel/Wine.htm]. He suggests that although the land has a tradition of winemaking that stretches back millennia, the ancient wines were nothing to write home about. "The wines shipped to ancient Egypt were so bad that they had to be seasoned with honey, pepper and juniper berries to make them palatable, and those sent to Rome and England during the height of ancient Roman civilization were so thick and sweet that no modern connoisseur could possibly approve of them. So bad were most of these wines that it was probably a good thing that the Muslim conquest in AD 636 imposed a 1,200-year halt to the local wine industry."

Fortunately things have changed. Rogov has sampled wines from Israel's largest and smallest wineries and is quite upbeat about their products. His comprehensive article explains how a small country can have five wine-making regions (Galil, Judean Hills, Shimshon, Negev and Shomron), and many more micro-climates. You'll find information about Israel's wineries, including Golan Heights Winery [www.golanwines.co.il/], Barkan Wine Cellars [www.olan.com/barkan/], Binyamina Wineries [www.binyaminawines.co.il/] and Dalton Winery [www.dalton-winery.com] and the largest of all, Carmel Mizrachi [www.carmelwines.co.il/], which buys 70 percent of Israel's grape wines.

But how do kosher wines compare to the rest of the market? The New York Times' WineToday has rated 19 kosher wines. Leading the list was a low-priced 1999 Baron Herzog Wine Cellars Chenin Blanc which the Times awarded four stars – "full-frontal fruit with a gentle hint of sweetness." To read more, go to the related WineToday article and click on the Reviews box [winetoday.com/story/0001219.html]. There are more reviews at eLuna.com [www.eluna.com/wine/wine.asp] and at about.com [www.wine.about.com/food/wine/library/weekly/aa122200.htm].

Daniel Rogov suggests that the improving quality of kosher wine has brought with it two related phenomena until recently unknown in kosher circles: wine bores and wine snobs [www.kosherfinder.com/KosherFinder/Features/F01.asp?FEATURE=125]. Here is one suggestion if you are confronted with a bore or snob: If someone says "1928 was wonderful vintage year for Bordeaux," you can say: "Yes, but a freak rainstorm destroyed the vintage in Montepluciano." Rogov has other essays linked to that page, on kosher champagne, wines from Italy and Chile and pairing the right cheese with the right wine.

Abarbanel Wines [www.abarbanel.com] is based in the Languedoc Roussillon region in the southwest of France, along the Mediterranean and near the border with Spain. (Incidentally, the family traces its name back to Don Yitzchak Abarbanel, famed religious leader and royal advisor to Queen Isabella and King Ferdinand.)

This wine has a hilarious bonus: its own theme song, which plays automatically on its home page. It's sung to the Beach Boys' hit Barbara Ann.

If you have trouble finding kosher wines where you live, you may have better luck on the Net. Online companies that ship to your door include DrinkKosherWine.com [www.drinkkosherwine.com/], Kosher Vineyards [www.ekosherwine.com/] and KosherWine.com which stocks over 230 wines [www.kosherwine.com/]. And If you are searching for the perfect kosher Chardonnay or want to recommend a delightful Zinfandel, you should take a look at Chowhound's Kosher Message Board [www.chowhound.com/boards/kosher/kosher.html]. Seth Ditchik wrote that this year, "I've made it my mission to find the world of kosher wine that exists outside of the sickly-sweet Manischewitz that haunts our seder every year." Stephen Kaye recommends a 1993 Barkan Reserve, and Alice likes Al Fasi from Chile and Bunyan's special kosher cuvée from Bandol (Provence).

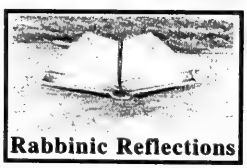
Focus on the home

By RABBI REUVEN TRADBURKS

The Midrash, as quoted by Rashi, says that blood was sprinkled on the inside of the doorpost of each Jewish family in Egypt.

Now this is odd, because the simple reading of the story says the blood was a sign, so that the Angel of Death would pass over the Jewish homes. In the special reading of Hachodesh this Shabbat, the Torah instructs the Jewish people to slaughter the paschal lamb, take the blood, smear it on the doorposts and then sit in their homes, eating the Pesach offering, matzah and maror, with their shoes on and their walking sticks ready to leave Egypt.



At midnight, the Torah says, the Angel of Death will pass through Egypt and will kill the first-born – but he will know that he is to pass over the Jewish homes because of that blood on the doorposts. After the first-born of the Egyptians die, the Jews must be ready to leave Egypt.

Why would they put the blood on the inside of the doorpost and not the outside? The blood should serve as a sign on the outside of the door for the Angel of Death, so that he can pass over the Jewish homes.

Between you and me, this question is a little trite – after all, this is an angel. If the angel can figure out who is the first-born amongst the Egyptians, he doesn't need the blood on the doorposts. Angels just kind of know these things – who is a first born, and who is a Jew.

What really is the meaning of the blood on the doorpost? It is not really for the Angel of Death at all; rather, it must be for some other reason.

I think you could view this as the symbol of how the Jew views miracles in Jewish history. Jewish history is full of miracles, a history that defies regular rules of human history. Whether it be the Exodus from Egypt amidst signs and wonders, or the story of Purim, or the State of Israel in the face of insurmountable opposition – Jewish history is the history of God leading us by the hand through the winding paths of history.

But how do we as Jews live, knowing that our lives are full of miracles? God says to the Jews in Egypt: "Let Me take care of the miracles, and while I do, I want you to busy yourselves with filling your home with mitzvot. Eat matzah, maror, the Pesach offering; put blood on the doors – leave the rest to Me." The blood on the inside of the door is to focus our attention on the inside of our home, the location of our activity.

This is the partnership of Jewish history – we fill our homes with mitzvot while we let Him do the miracles. Not every moment will bring a miracle and not every era will end with the types of miracles of Egypt. The miracles, their time and their place, are not our business – we do our mitzvot in the quiet of our home. He will take care of the rest.

Canada gets two new representatives to JDC

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Leo Goldhar is – to the best of his knowledge – Toronto's first official member of the board of directors of the Joint Distribution Committee (JDC).

Leo Goldhar

Montrealer Yoine Goldstein joined the 150-member JDC board along with Goldhar in December.

UIA Federations Canada (UIAFC) gives $400,000 a year to the 87-year-old agency. "We're hoping to bring our contribution to $2 million within about two years," said Goldhar, 69, in an interview at his office at First Professional Management Inc., the real estate development and building firm now run by his two sons.

The JDC money will be raised privately by way of two projects, explained Goldhar, whose other community involvements include chairing the York Region Jewish Campus Development Project of Jewish Toronto Tomorrow and co-chairing a fund-raising effort for the University Health Network, formerly the Toronto Hospital.

JDC funds are being raised in Toronto to help Jews in Kishinev, Moldova, which has a Jewish population of about 25,000.

Montreal has committed $1 million, most of which has already been raised, for the community in Kievskaya, a town on the periphery of Kiev, Ukraine. The area has "a large number of impecunious Jews trying to survive on meagre pensions," said Goldstein, 66, in a phone interview from his Montreal law office.

"The level of poverty and the needs are terrible, absolutely terrible," he added. Many people cannot leave their walk-up apartments because of physical disability, he noted. "The work the Joint is doing is superb."

Yoine Goldstein

Support of individual communities through the JDC is "not a new phenomenon, nor should it be," Goldstein said. "The Canadian community has been supporting JDC for many years."

Although it is "predominantly an American organization," JDC has been working recently to become North American instead of merely American, he added. "That results from a number of factors, not least the increased activity of Canadian federations."

According to a UJA FEDERATION press release, the drive for a closer link between Canada and JDC has come from donors who are becoming increasingly interested in how their philanthropic dollars are being spent, says Maxyne Finkelstein, executive vice-president of UIAFC. "We've started taking more trips to the former Soviet Union and Eastern Europe," she noted.

"The JDC has people involved in establishing community centres, food supplies to the needy, blankets, clothing and medical aid, and we contribute to that for the Kishinev area," said Goldhar, a Toronto native who has a particular affinity for the JDC through his wife, Sala, a child survivor of the Holocaust who is involved with UJA.

"When she was found after the war, she was put in a DP camp that was run and funded in Poland by the Joint Distribution Committee and other organizations," Goldhar recalled. Two years ago the couple visited the orphanage that housed Sala after she left the DP camp and saw the plaque commemorating the JDC's involvement.

Goldstein, who is incoming president of UIAFC and is also on the board of the Jewish Agency, takes issue with anyone who says the Jewish Agency is working at cross-purposes to the JDC.

While the JDC provides an infrastructure to support Jewish communities where they are, the Jewish Agency educates people with a view to encouraging aliyah, he explained.

He admits the two agencies compete for dollars, but feels there's "no [other] conflict at all. There are a good number of people on the board of both."

Mentschlichkeit in the curriculum

By GILA ASHTOR

We are small but we are many
We are young but we unite,
To the candle of continuity
You are the flame, and we're the light.

A catchy advertisement once tried to indoctrinate its audience with the phrase: "Be all you can be." But what would happen, if it said to be better than you can be? To be the best that you can be. To be awesome. To be great. To stand above the rest. To soar within the realm of possibility. To drink milk. To love life.

Generation neXt

Fellow readers, young people, teenagers and confused adolescents – we are 16, 17, 18. How can we be expected to understand what we should be? We know that our era needs doctors, scientists, geneticists. We need lawyers, journalists and presidents. We are a generation that seeks professionalism more than anything else, which is OK, until we begin to embrace CEOs more willingly than our friends, our parents or our peers. So here we are, young future leaders of Toronto's Jewish community, and we seem exempt from human decency, cultural etiquette and simple mentschlichkeit.

Fania Gefter, a family member who has seven grandchildren in day schools in Toronto, is quick to voice disappointment and frustration at what she feels is a lack of values being taught in the classroom: "It is one thing to learn math and science, but it is another thing to be a good person, with values and morals and principles."

"Mentschlichkeit", says Rabbi Yigal Gurvitz, "will not pay the bills." As teacher of special Talmud at CHAT, Rabbi Gurvitz believes that until we accept each other and ourselves, it won't matter what car we drive or what house we live in. "You have to understand, that being a mentsch will not buy you a dream car or pay off the mortgage, but it will make you happy, and it will make you wealthy at heart."

Materialism will certainly help you afford the clothes and the cottage, even the CHAT tuition, but it won't buy your laughter or your love. It can't.

Unless part of our job is being an awesome person, a mentsch, and a truly noble human being, then nothing can quench our hunger for purpose and meaning. Whether we leave work at 5 p.m. or end our job at 65 years of age, we will never really stop. Mentschlichkeit is overtime. Without vacation. Without exception.

Truthfully, I am just as confused as anyone, and we are all likely, at some point, to be equally lost. But as long as we are noble, honourable, faithful and kind, I know that we will be OK, no matter what we do. In the words of Psalm 43: "Do not fear if a man should increase the size of his house, because he will not take it with him when he leaves this world."

So forget the catchy motto of military recruitments and let us instead adopt an eagerness to be better, a willingness to be good and a capacity to be special leaders, visionaries and decent human beings.

We don't have to be all we can be, as long as we're awesome. Great. As long as we stand above the rest and soar within the realms of possibilities. We don't have to be the best we can be, we just have to be mentschen. And as we grow older, we might even realize how closely the two are intertwined.

Greater Toronto Area

This Friday marks Shabbat across N. America

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Thirty-eight Canadian congregations and organizations, representing the spectrum from Reform to Orthodox, will take part this weekend in Shabbat Across America/Canada, a project of the National Jewish Outreach Program (NJOP). The program will run at more than 700 locations in all.

NJOP, a New York-based outreach organization formed in 1987, is touting the program's relevancy for overworked Jews. Taking a day of rest "is not frivolous behaviour. It's essential to our physical and mental well-being," said NJOP program director Rabbi Yitzchak Rosenbaum in a news release.

"Sabbath observant Jews find that Shabbat forces them to stop and reflect on what is truly important – family, friends and faith."

Jewish Campus Services (JCS) of Greater Toronto is one of several Canadian Hillel affiliates to take part in the program. Others include campuses in Montreal and Vancouver.

For the Toronto campus program, a Shabbat dinner will follow three concurrent Friday night services – Reform, Conservative and Orthodox – at the Bernard Betel Centre. Organizers expect about 150 people, said Shayna Allen, JCS' Graduates and Professionals (GAP) co-ordinator. Dinner programming is being planned to be "light and fun," with a lot of singing, she added.

JCS has been sponsoring the event, which is student-organized, for several years.

"I think it's a great opportunity for students," said Allen. "We do a lot of Shabbat programs, but this is the one day where they know that everybody is doing the exact same programming."

Among the Toronto synagogues is Beth Emeth Bais Yehuda Synagogue, which is combining the NJOP event with JTS (Jewish Theological Seminary) Shabbat, for a "big weekend" program with an undergraduate student representative of the Conservative seminary.

Shabbat is the cornerstone of Judaism, says Rabbi Yehouda Benoliel, who is organizing the program at Montreal's Congregation Chouva Israel. "It's really beautiful to have a movement that goes across North America."

Rabbi Benoliel, whose father is spiritual leader of the Moroccan congregation, hopes that participants will be inspired to continue celebrating Shabbat after the program is over. The Chouva Israel event, which is open to everyone, will include an end-of-Shabbat meal Saturday night, featuring dafina (more commonly known in its Ashkenazi incarnation as cholent).

Two provinces to the west, Temple Shalom, Winnipeg's only Reform congregation, is planning its fourth Shabbat Across Canada event.

"We always thought it was a really good idea," said temple administrator Candice Stearns. "To reinvent Shabbat – a lot of people in a busy week don't do much about it."

Stearns noted the materials sent out by the Union of American Hebrew Congregations and NJOP especially for the program – an explanatory service from the former and, from the latter, a mix of items including menu ideas and prayers recited before meals in a format for posting on a wall.

The 100-family congregation expects about 50 to 55 people (about 15 more than the average week) for this Friday night's service – a learner's service to be led by Rabbi Michael Levenson and cantorial soloist Len Udow – and dinner.

"It's really nice," said Stearns. "It's always a pleasant service. People have a good time."

Other participating Canadian cities with participating congregations include Vancouver, Edmonton, Calgary, Windsor, Hamilton and Moncton. For further information, call 1-888-SHABBAT or see the NJOP website at www.njop.org.

Israeli environmentalist bolsters Canadian connection

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Four years ago at the Maccabiah Games in Israel, dozens of Australian athletes were thrown into the Yarkon River when a footbridge collapsed during the Games' opening ceremonies. One athlete drowned but three others died later and many were made ill after they ingested the toxic waters that flowed in the polluted Yarkon.

Filthy though it may have been, and still is, the Yarkon is nowhere near the most polluted river in Israel, said Alon Tal, lawyer, environmentalist and director of the Arava Institute for Environmental Studies.

In fact, he said, the Yarkon is quite typical, even symptomatic of what plagues the Israeli environment. "Air pollution has doubled in the last 18 years, 40 per cent of the drinking water is unfit for human consumption," he said.

Tal, 40, delivered that stinging indictment after spending much of the last 10 years fighting hard to protect Israel from environmental degradation. He was in Canada recently to solidify the exchange program the Arava Institute enjoys with York University as well as to establish a similar program with Trent University that will focus on watershed ecology.

A dynamo, with his finger in many ecological pies, Tal founded the Arava Institute in 1996 to answer an urgent need in Israel for a single institution that combined scientific, legal and advocacy work on behalf of the environment. The institute is located on Kibbutz Ketura in Israel's deep south, near Eilat and close to the borders of Jordan and Egypt. It serves as a regional centre for conservation and environmental protection activities.

In 1991, Tal founded the Israel Union for Environmental Defense (IUED), a lobbying and public affairs organization based in Tel Aviv.

The Arava Institute offers a co-operative working environment for Israeli, Jordanian and Palestinian students, as well as exchange students from Canada and elsewhere. On average, four or five Canadians study at the institute for one or two semesters each year, Tal said.

The programs are hands-on and students tackle subjects that range from organic agriculture, to Eilat's coral reefs, to nature reserves to environmental activism.

"We're training young environmental leaders," Tal said. That includes "lawyers, bureaucrats and NGO rabble rousers."

The institute's Canadian connection goes beyond the handful of students who take part in the program. The institute is on the list of recipients who benefit from grants from the New Israel Fund, as does the IUED. The IUED also benefited from a seed grant from David and Linda Bronfman and is today Israel's second largest environmental agency, Tal said.

The UJA FEDERATION of Greater Toronto supports the Arava Institute with scholarships grants of $12,000 (US) per year for Toronto students participating in the school's exchange program, said UJA spokesperson Howard English. The program has been in existence for the past five years.

Funding is directed through the Partnership 2000 program, which has twinned Toronto with Eilat and the surrounding region, English said.

Eilat and its renowned coral reefs are practically at Tal's back door. The reefs, famous for their beauty and wide assortment of sea life, are facing a man-made danger.

"The Gulf of Eilat is dying because of thoughtless development and a range of pollution sources," Tal said.

The culprit behind Israel's environmental degradation is the unquestioned push to develop and modernize the country while barely giving the environment a second thought. What's needed now is a "philosophical change, one that recognizes that resources are extremely scarce and that there is no margin for error," he said.

Tal, a native of North Carolina who moved to Israel 23 years ago, admits the Israeli environmental movement faces something of an uphill battle.

"There are competing priorities, security, the economy, plus powerful forces of Zionism that favoured development... while neglecting the environment," he said.

Developing partnerships with Diaspora Jewish communities is part of his strategy to save Israel's neglected environment.

"The environment is a natural meeting point," he said. "We hold the land of Israel in trust for Israel and the Jewish people and Canadian Jews have a stake in it."

We must not forget mourners after the shivah

By RABBI REUVEN P. BULKA

Feature

Visiting people who are in mourning, what has come to be known as the shivah visit, is a most important mitzvah. Even though the obligation to visit and comfort mourners is technically of Rabbinic origin, the fulfilment of this mitzvah nevertheless falls within the parameters of the sacred obligation to "love your fellow as yourself" (Maimonides, Laws of Mourning, 14:1).

Maimonides also states that this mitzvah manifests the bestowing of kindness with one's entire being, and that there is no limit to this fulfilment. In other words, we can never do more than enough, and perhaps, likewise, we can never do enough.

But the fact that we can never do enough is no reason to desist, in line with the famous exhortation, "It is not incumbent upon you to complete the task, but neither are you so free from responsibility as to desist from it" (Chapters of the Elders, 2:21).

Rabbi Reuven Bulka

And we must never lose sight of the general imperative that in everything we do, we must go beyond the letter of the law, or more precisely, inside the letter of the law (Sefer Mitzvot Katan, #49).

With all this as background, I would like to share some thoughts about a particular nuance of shivah, what I call the "post-shivah syndrome." "Post-shivah syndrome" occurs when everyone scatters back to their homes, and the mourners are left to pick up the pieces by themselves. To be fair, this does not occur at every shivah, but it is not a rare phenomenon.

Consider the shivah reality. Family and friends gather at the home where the mourning is being observed. When there are many family and friends, the shivah house can at times become what some people, in a combination of frustration and sarcasm, would call a zoo. With an incessant flow of traffic, the mourners get hardly a chance to catch their breath, and the end of shivah comes as a relief.

Such emotional draining of the mourners is not what shivah was intended to achieve. On the contrary: shivah was intended to bring comfort and strength, so that at its conclusion, the mourners could "get up" from the throes of despair and reconnect with life.

Sociologists may quibble with the following analysis, but it seems that all this may in some way be related to the spread-out world we live in.

We generally do not live in enclosed, complete communities. Instead, we live in pockets, and are often separated from family and close friends by significant geographic chasms. For joyous or sorrowful occasions, we bridge the chasm in a way that previous generations could not.

More likely to create an artificial reality rather than a reflection of how family normally functions

Shivah is therefore more likely to create an artificial reality rather than a reflection of how the family normally functions.

Precious little "grief work" actually takes place during shivah. Instead, it usually (not always) serves as a buffer zone, shielding the mourners from their actual pain and grief by diverting their thoughts through conversation. This type of "diversion" does help in some way, as it allows the raw wounds of grief to heal somewhat. Following the shivah, the mourners are in better mental and emotional shape to confront their grief and come to grips with their new, depleted world.

Ideally, the coming to grips with the new realities of a world bereft of a beloved should actually unfold during the shivah. The first three days of the seven day mourning period are for intense, private grieving. Visiting for the sake of comforting mourners is discouraged for these three days.

From the morning of the third day of the shivah, comforting becomes not only possible but also desirable. It may not be wholly achieved in this short time period up to the seventh day, but the process can surely be launched. The hope is that by the time the shivah has concluded, the mourners can be relieved of some of their despair.

However, as previously mentioned, because in so many instances the social world of shivah is an unrealistic one, the processes that should unfold during that time never get off the ground. This is not said in condemnation of anyone. Instead, it is said as a lament of modern exigencies.

What can we do about this? For one, if we are aware that our obligation in visiting mourners is to comfort them and bring them hope, we can focus on this in advance and contemplate how we will achieve this during the shivah visit.

There are no magical linguistic formulae that can instantly extricate mourners from their depths. And there is no one who can singlehandedly be the emotional crane that lifts the mourner from despair. Every visiting person can do a little bit by humbly exhibiting a genuine caring, a sense that "we are with you."

But how much are we really "with" the mourner? What happens at the conclusion of the shivah is that the family members and very close friends who live out of town legitimately have to resume their lives. The same is more or less true of the people who live close by.

The upshot of all this is that the aftermath of shivah becomes a time of double void. The void of the now empty home is super-imposed upon the void created by the loss that is still very much present, making the semi-forgotten mourner intensely, painfully alone. No wonder so many people dread the post-shivah period.

What is being herein proposed, in the light of our experience with shivah, and specifically of the double void of the post-shivah syndrome, is that we begin to think of "comforting mourners" as a mitzvah that is not restricted to the seven day shivah period.

We know that, according to the pure Halachah, Jewish law, comforting mourners does not end with shivah. But the stark reality is that the shivah's conclusion all too often marks a mythical end, an unspoken conclusion of the public's involvement with the grieving mourners.

For the multitude among us who visit mourners during shivah, think of the impact we will have if, a few days after shivah concludes, we call up the bereft widow or orphaned child and ask them how they are managing, or if there is anything we can do for them. Never mind that heretofore we may not have been the closest of friends. Friendships always have a beginning point, and this is as meaningful a point as any.

Though there is an understandable reluctance to impose new ritual obligations, it is nevertheless quite obvious that it would be so helpful for the well-being of our community if we thought of the shivah visit as only a part of the obligation to comfort mourners, to be completed by a post-shivah contact.

And though it may sound nice to say to the mourner, just before hanging up the phone or concluding a visit, "If you need anything, do not hesitate to call," this is not the right thing to say since it puts the onus on the mourner to come asking.

The essence of true friendship and concern is to know, or to intuit, what our friends need, or what our friend can use, such as an uplift, a listening ear, accompaniment on tedious but necessary errands, or a driver to take him or her around.

Therefore, it is wise to be prepared, within the limitations of the time, to offer concrete ways that we can help – not to impose, but to propose; or, if that is not possible, to simply stay in contact in a caring, sensitive way.

This approach extends the concern for the mourner beyond the shivah, beyond the letter of the law. But since we are enjoined to go beyond the letter, this is a more than appropriate thing to do.

And by so doing, we will have more fully embraced the responsibility of bringing comfort to others. We will have more completely embraced the essential Judaic affirmation to love one's neighbour as one oneself. This is, at once, the bottom line.

Rabbi Bulka is the spiritual leader of Congregation Machzikei Hadas in Ottawa.

Fundraiser cycles 1,000 km in 2 days for MS

TORONTO — Cyclist and fundraiser Mark Hopper travelled over 1,000 km in 38 hours to find a cure for multiple sclerosis – without leaving Toronto!

Pedaling the equivalent of the distance between Toronto and New Brunswick on a set of rollers, Hopper raised almost $1,500 as part of his Third Annual Charity Ride for Multiple Sclerosis at the 2001 Toronto International Bicycle Show.

He travelled an average speed of 26 kilometers per hour, and pedaled day and night over the course of the weekend.

Hopper's commitment to finding a cure for MS began in 1985 when his wife Taryn was diagnosed with the disease. He has participated in the MS Bike and In-Line Skating Tours since 1991 and began his stationary journey for a cure in 1999.

"It is my hope that by raising funds in these charity events, research programs supported by the MS Society will soon find a cure for this disease," Hopper said.

Hopper's fundraising success was achieved through the generosity of outside sponsors and show attendees. The $1,500 donated will be added to funds raised during the annual MS Bike and In-Line Skating Tours.

Last year, 2,200 participants across Ontario raised over $1 million to bring the Tours' 12-year total to more than $15 million.

This money funds research into finding a cure for multiple sclerosis, as well as providing services to those currently living with this unpredictable, often disabling disease.

More information about multiple sclerosis and the MS Bike and In-Line Skating Tours is available at (416) 967-3038, or by visiting www.msbiketours.com.

Lecture series explores theology of Judaism

By LEILA SPEISMAN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — The first line of the book of Genesis, "In the beginning, God created the heavens and the earth," is the paradigm, not only for the Torah, but for the whole theology of Judaism, says Kenneth Seeskin, professor and chair of the philosophy department of Northwestern University in Chicago, and director of its Jewish studies program.

"The opening of the Torah is the key with which we can unlock the kingdom."

Seeskin is this year's Shoshana Shier Distinguished Visiting Professor in Jewish Studies of the University of Toronto Faculty of Arts and Science Jewish studies program. He was giving the second in a three-part public lecture series titled Looking at Judaism Philosophically.

The story of Creation begins abruptly, he said, with no introduction, or explanation. "Who is God? What else has He done? What is His background?"

There is no mention of anything except God, Seeskin said. That in itself is significant. "Only God did it [created the world.] There is no other factor."

This theme is repeated in the Hagaddah, Seeskin said, when God asserts that He alone took the Jews out of Egypt. "I alone, and not an angel." Both passages emphasize God's uniqueness.

> 'The opening of the Torah is the key with which we can unlock the kingdom'

If there is no other force involved, he said, then "God operates without constraints. The world exists because God chose to create it, not because He had to."

Seeskin believes the fact that "God created the world out of nothing" is another sign of God's uniqueness. "There is no analogue; no one else can make something out of nothing."

The story of Creation also teaches us about the true meaning of freedom, through the statement that on the seventh day, God rested, said Seeskin.

"God didn't rest because he was bored or exhausted. He didn't lie on a couch like we do on Shabbat."

Rest is a privilege, he said. If we make the decision to rest, it means that we can stop working when we want to, that when we do work, it is by choice.

"The point of the Torah saying that God rested is that that was a free choice for Him."

Freedom, he said, is "not only the ability to choose chocolate or vanilla. God had the freedom to create or not to create. He was free to create a very different world from this one."

In the beginning, he said, God "didn't just create the world and go to Tahiti." Rather, He also took on the responsibility of creating, renewing, sustaining and overlooking it. And sustaining something is as hard as creating it.

"Freedom is the willingness to choose a certain way again. It is not just to create – it is to sustain."

Commitment, Seeskin said, must be ongoing. He compared it to love, which he said is not just falling in love like in romantic novels or movies. "It is a commitment about what we will do. It commits us to other choices down the line."

Love, he said, is not genuine unless you keep falling in love. If you don't, "you don't have it and you never had it."

Similarly, creation has to be renewed every day, or it is not worthy of the name.

God made a promise, a covenant, when he created the world, and He can be held to account.

On the other hand, a promise is a limitation. "If I promise something, I am bound by that promise, I am limited."

Freedom, said Seeskin, "is not avoiding responsibility. It is a free acceptance of that responsibility.'

He described God's decision to create and sustain the world as an example of true autonomy. "Autonomy is the self-imposition of law – taking responsibility by one's own decision."

God, then, "is the ultimate free agent."

While we can't imitate God's act of creation, we can imitate His taking responsibility.

When Israel was freed from Egyptian bondage, all it meant was that their "external shackles were removed. However, to be truly free, you have to do more than run around in a state of moral chaos," Seeskin said.

This is the significance of what happened at Mount Sinai when God gave the Jewish people the Torah, Seeskin said. "They were asked to take moral responsibility."

The commandments are not just orders, like those of a dictator. "By giving us the commandments, God is making a covenant to which both sides are asked to agree."

God wants us to enter the covenant and renew it every day, just as God made the choice to create and sustain the world, he said.

In the morning prayers, he said, we acknowledge that God renews His commitment to sustain the world every day: "He who illuminates the earth… and in His goodness renews daily, perpetually, the work of creation," which is recited in the morning prayers just before the Shema.

In the Hagaddah, he said, we are asked to feel as if we personally came out of Egypt. Shavuot is the re-enactment of the giving of the Torah at Sinai.

In reply to a question from the audience, Seeskin said that commitment to "all the important things in life, like love and the family, have to be renewed. That's why Creation is a model for everything."

83-year-old Kirkland Lake man has second bar mitzvah

By DIANE KOVEN
Ottawa Correspondent

OTTAWA — Eddie Duke of Kirkland Lake, Ont. has something in common with Kirk Douglas. They are both fortunate enough to have celebrated a second bar mitzvah at the age of 83.

"One day, as I was watching television," says Duke, "I saw Kirk Douglas talking about the fact that three score and 10 is a full life for a man and if he has another 13, he can have another bar mitzvah. He told about having had a second bar mitzvah himself and I thought that I would like to have one, too."

Duke grew up in Kirkland Lake where he had his first bar mitzvah. As a child, he felt he wouldn't be able to chant a Haftorah because he was told he couldn't sing. Although his father had hired a teacher for him, he lacked the self-confidence to "perform."

"At my first bar mitzvah," he says, "I just did the blessings and made a speech – in English and in Yiddish – and we had a nice party. But I knew I didn't do it right and I decided that some day I would do it again." He somehow felt that he had let his father down and vowed to make amends.

Seven Jews in city

Though once a thriving Jewish community of 48 families with an active synagogue (of which Duke was president), Kirkland Lake now is home to only seven Jews. It did not seem possible to have the bar mitzvah there. He thought briefly of doing it in Toronto where his daughter, Libby, lives and where another daughter, Shelley, lived until she passed away last year.

On a visit to Ottawa where his son, Lorne, lives with his family, Duke attended services at Congregation Adath Shalom. He mentioned to family friend Joel Yan that he was thinking about having another bar mitzvah and Yan stepped in to help. He made a tape of the blessings and Haftorah and sent it to Duke in Kirkland Lake who practised diligently until he was ready.

A week before the big event, Duke returned to Ottawa and practised with Yan. The members of Congregation Adath Shalom welcomed him and joined his family in their simchah. "Finally," says Duke, "at last, it was my big moment. They called me up and I did it. I cried while I did it and I think there were a few people in the congregation who did, too. I really think my father heard me!"

The Havdalah candle used for the service had been made by Duke's late daughter, Shelley. The candle became her link to the family celebration of her father's bar mitzvah.

Duke's son Lorne said he was very proud of his father's accomplishment and happy that he had chosen to have the bar mitzvah in Ottawa, with his family.

"It was nice to see the warmth with which he was greeted by the members of Adath Shalom and the way they supported him," he said. "He felt good about it and I think the congregation felt good about it, too. An occasion such as that doesn't happen often. I was proud that he had done it."

Coast to Coast

Ottawa's Soloway JCC takes part in 2001 Kallah

By DIANE KOVEN
Ottawa Correspondent

OTTAWA — The Soloway JCC was one of five Jewish community centres in Canada that took part in a revolutionary gathering in cyberspace with thousands of others around North America.

The first of three programs sponsored by the JCC Association and the 92nd Street Y in New York City, was simulcast to over 30 cities on March 11.

The 2001 Kallah: L'Takein u L'Kadeish/A Gathering: to Transform and to Elevate, was based on the custom in talmudic times, to gather during the Hebrew months of Elul and Adar for the purpose of Jewish study.

The modern version of the kallah is an initiative to allow Jews to study together through the wonders of technology.

While the panel, which included Harvard Law professor Alan Dershowitz; nationally syndicated radio talk show host and author Dennis Prager; and author and columnist for the New York Observer, Anne Roiphe sat before a live audience at the 92nd Street Y, moderator Rabbi David Woznica began by asking audience members – both in New York and around the continent – to join in reciting a blessing in Hebrew and English.

Rabbi Woznica directed questions to the panelists, and audiences across North America watched a live simulcast on large-screen televisions. They were also able to send their own questions via fax and e-mail.

Rabbi Woznica read the questions and identified the senders.

The over 250 people who gathered at the Soloway JCC listened to discussions such as, how can we ensure strength and commitment among North American Jews now and in the future – and what should we be committed to; and can and should secular Judaism sustain itself."

Ideas flowed and occasionally voices were raised, but each panelist demonstrated knowledge and commitment to his or her ideas and beliefs and all provided food for thought.

Each city had a local moderator who accepted questions from the live audience at the end of the simulcast, allowing for discussion among one's own community members.

Two additional simulcasts have been scheduled for March 20 and March 25.

Ottawa's participation in the kallah was supported by the Lorry Greenberg Foundation, the United Jewish Appeal of Ottawa and a number of individual community members, as well as Congregations Agudath Israel, Beth Shalom West, Beth Shalom, Machzikei Hadas and Temple Israel.

Eppel heads east on QEW to new UJA post

By MOURA WOLPERT
Special to The CJN

HAMILTON — After more than seven years as its executive director, Patricia Tolkin Eppel has resigned from the Hamilton UJA FEDERATION.

Eppel has been appointed director of planning of the new Jewish Community Campus, Toronto UJA FEDERATION, York Region.

Yet Eppel assured volunteers, staff and board members at a farewell tribute party at Wendy and Lorry Schneider's home that she is not leaving the area and will remain a member and staunch supporter of the local community.

In their tributes, David Steinberg, federation president at the time Eppel became its executive director, and Legacy Endowment Fund chair and former president, Stan Tick, praised her for her dedication to the community, her many accomplishments and her hard work and skill in handling a difficult and demanding job. There were also tributes from the staff and some good natured ribbing from Schneider, editor of the Hamilton Jewish News and director of the Legacy Endowment Fund and Leadership Development.

Eppel leaves the Hamilton community considerably richer in services than when she was appointed executive director. She is most proud, she said in a telephone interview, of having at last established the long-planned Legacy Endowment Fund and of raising the importance of UJA FEDERATION in the community. Also, under her direction, the Midrasha high school was established, as well as the Israel Experience Scholarship and Young Leadership programs and the Kiev Hunger project.

Eppel graduated from Trinity College, Dublin, with a BA in philosophy, psychology and biblical studies, and holds MSW and PhD degrees in medical sciences (growth and development) from McMaster University. She has also taken a course in office management and has worked in various retail and office jobs. She has spent a year in Israel and has been an active volunteer in the Jewish community.

When she was a small girl growing up in Dublin, she dreamt of becoming a town planner. Of her new job, she says, "I have married my love for town planning with my passion for communal work."

Eppel is married to Hamilton psychiatrist Dr. Alan Eppel. Their daughter, Ayelet, is a recent science graduate of the University of Western Ontario, their son Noam is in the computer business in Toronto, and their youngest son, Yonah, is in high school.

Workshop brings seder alive

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Participants in a pre-Passover workshop for those in their 20s and 30s will learn how to make the seder a living, vibrant experience, says Rabbi Neal Loevinger, director of outreach for Kolel: The Adult Centre for Liberal Jewish Learning.

The workshop, led by Rabbi Loevinger and Rabbi Daveen Litwin of Temple Sinai, is part of Kolel's YUJJIES (Young Urban Jews); it is one in a continuing series of programs held on the last Sunday of every month.

"We are going to discuss different interpretations that can be brought to the family seder to make it a ritual that lives and breathes in 2001, or 5761," he said.

Some young people are uncomfortable with the Hagaddah because the translations are out of date, he said. " We want to give people conceptual tools to ask questions that will make the seder more relevant."

There are many physical rituals during the seder that "can be merely done, or else can be done as a prompt to some very profound questions.

"Breaking the matzah, for example, can prompt a discussion on the difference between whole and broken human beings. If we add a discussion, the ritual can take on a whole different meaning," said Rabbi Loevinger.

The workshop takes place March 25, 7:30 p.m., at the Kolel Centre, 151 Eglinton Ave. W. It will be followed by a chametz fest – all the cookies and pretzels you can eat – and music. For information, call 416-485-7002 or check out the Web site at www.kolel.org.

OTTAWA — A unique partnership between the Israeli Embassy and Jewish Family Services (JFS) recently gave two young Israeli musicians the opportunity to perform for a large and appreciative audience here in Canada.

On Sunday, March 11, violist Shmuel Katz and pianist Dmitri Shteinberg, both currently studying at the Manhattan School of Music in New York, performed at the National Library of Canada a program which consisted of Schubert's Sonata "Arpeggione" D. 821 in A Minor; a selection by E. Partos called "In Memoriam," a tribute to holocaust victims; Old French Dances by M. Marias; and J. Brahms' Sonata Op. 120 #2 in F Minor. The concert was the brainchild of embassy counsellor Amir Maimon and a collaborative effort between the Israeli Embassy and the Canada-Israel Cultural Foundation (CICF).

During his tenure in the nation's capital, Maimon has attempted to reach and engage members of the Jewish community in a variety of programs featuring Israel.

"It is very important to co-operate with every sector of the Jewish community," he says. "This is not the first time the embassy has involved Jewish Family Services in our programs. Our first joint venture was our Chanukah party on Parliament Hill which was very well received. We are planning to continue with our fruitful association with community organizations."

This type of program fits the CICF mandate in several ways, says Norman Barwin, the CICF's chapter president in Ottawa. "With all the troubles in Israel, we wanted to let people know that there is another side of Israel, a cultural side."

In addition to exposing the public to Israel's culture, CICF aids cultural exchanges and helps Israeli musicians to study in North America.

"We were very excited about this concert because the young pianist was here in 1994 as a recipient of the CICF scholarship," Barwin says. "We are hoping in the next year to have a series of concerts of young Israeli musicians here."

Many of the clients of Jewish Family Services are immigrants from Eastern Europe who have cultured backgrounds. As immigrants, they are limited financially and unable to attend concerts and other cultural events.

"This type of collaboration has made it possible for many of our clients, who would otherwise not be able to attend, to do so," says JFS executive director Mark Zarecki. "For the low cost of $5, about 100 clients who would not normally come out to a community event were able to."

Zarecki has high praise for the embassy for including all members of the Jewish community in their events. "The embassy has been wonderful," he says. "They deserve much credit for inviting our clients to several of their events which they would not normally have access to."

During the intermission, the musicians mingled with audience members over refreshments provided by CICF members.

Mideast dossier tests the Hill

Now that the 37th Parliament has settled into its second month, all the cast members have got their lines down pat and the daily Matinee Feature (Question Period) plays out with predictable precision.

Looking for some distraction, your faithful scribe has put together a couple of notes as a "heads-up" on issues that I will return to in greater detail over the next few months.

Item: With John Manley now formally scheduled to undertake his maiden voyage to the Middle East as foreign minister, all of his colleagues who somehow regard themselves as 'stakeholders' in the Canada-Israel relationship are jockeying for seats on the government jet that will whisk Manley to four destinations in four days (Jordan, Israel, Egypt and the Palestinian-controlled territories).

Of particular interest will be the tug-of-war between Irwin Cotler and Yvon Charbonneau. In his time, Lloyd Axworthy had raised Cotler's status by appointing him as a 'special envoy' to promote ratification of the International Criminal Court. Some are suggesting that Cotler is currently in a bit of a deep-freeze due to his criticism of the government on the human rights file and his conduct during the election campaign regarding Canada's anti-Israel voting record in the UN. For his part, Charbonneau, the former head of the strident Quebec Teachers Federation, has a new, elevated status within the Liberal caucus. He will certainly try to parlay that status into a visible pro-Palestinian presence on the trip.

Ironically, therefore, Manley's first test on his handling of the Middle East dossier will be played out here at home.

Speaking of the Middle East, the greatest activities on the Hill lately have been briefings by Middle East experts on the current situation.

Vancouver MP Libby Davis seems to have taken over from Svend Robinson as the chief NDP frontperson for the Arab cause. She has facilitated several events recently including a briefing by an Israeli-Arab Member of Knesset on the evils of the Zionist state.

It could be that she is motivated because the Canada-Israel Parliamentary Association just re-elected Carolyn Bennett as its chair. Bennett has been instrumental in raising the profile of the links between Israeli and Canadian parliamentarians and is planning a series of bi-national consultations that may generate considerable attention over the next couple of years. With Bennett at the helm, Libby Davis does indeed have cause for concern.

Shalom BC's Givon reaches out to community

By MARLANE PRESS
Pacific Correspondent

VANCOUVER — As executive director of Shalom BC, Daniella Givon is perfectly suited to her career.

She describes herself as a community person who enjoys networking and meeting new people.

"Being involved in the community gives me a lot of pleasure because I am able to help people," Givon said.

"It isn't a social service [agency], but it is help on a different level."

Shalom BC, a Jewish information and referral service that opened in 1989, assists new British Columbia residents and visitors who seek details about local Jewish communities.

Formerly called Shalom Vancouver, the name recently changed in response to growing Jewish communities outside of Vancouver, particularly in Victoria and Kelowna.

"We mostly have local information about Jewish organizations, synagogues, schools and events," Givon said.

"But we also have some out-of-town information that seems to be needed on things such as the Israeli consulate and the Wiesenthal Centre. And you don't have to be Jewish to ask questions. We will always answer them."

The questions Givon and her staff of volunteers routinely receive aren't necessarily limited to who, what, where and when. There are also many why's.

Just after the movie Schindler's List was released, Givon said, Shalom BC fielded some interesting queries.

"We had a lot of people who called wondering about the meaning of stones on graves," she said.

"It's varied – all kinds of interesting questions. Anything from kashrut questions about kosher salt, to where to buy certain gifts or foods.

"We also hear from people who tell us they just discovered they're Jewish and want to find out more about it."

For out-of-town visitors interested in connecting with the Jewish community, Shalom BC can provide a package of information about Jewish activities and events.

For new BC residents, the organization offers a welcome service that includes a publication entitled A Guide to Jewish Life and various general-interest pamphlets about such things as looking for housing, health insurance and tenant rights.

"We ask the newcomers to come in for about 20 to 40 minutes to meet with us. We'll connect them with a synagogue if that's what they want, too.

We also have a mentoring program which matches newcomers for six months with either a family – depending if the newcomer is part of a family – or with singles," Givon said.

"Our objective is integration into the Jewish community and into the general community."

Shalom BC is located on the main floor of the Jewish Community Centre, 950 W. 41st Avenue. Phone (604)257-5111 for further information.

URGENT PLEA

Dear Friend עמו"ש,

We are taught by חז"ל about the importance of being נושא בעול עם חברו - helping a fellow Jew with his or her burden. Sometimes, however, a particular situation touches us so profoundly that we are compelled to act even more compassionately than we usually do.

Such is the case about which we are writing. You very likely heard recently about a terrible tragedy that occurred in ארץ ישראל, in which a young father of forty, בן תורה a, was killed together with his youngest child - a nine-year-old daughter - in an automobile accident. This occurred as he drove through a perilous stretch of road near ירושלים, in a region where Arabs often throw rocks.

The young widow, רחמנא ליצלן, who is a native of Toronto, daughter of Tibi and Yehosheva Guttman, is now left with three sons and with little recourse for securing fundamental פרנסה. An emergency fund is being set up in this city to assist the family in their times of need ahead. The fund will remain here and will בע"ה generate a monthly income.

We are asking that you respond warmly to our call for assistance.

Cheques can be made payable to: MEOROT, c/o Mr. Ephraim Reichmann, 98 Prue Ave., Toronto, Ont. M6B 1R5. Please include your return address. All donors of $18 or more will receive a charitable tax receipt.

And may the רבונו של עולם grant that we all be spared further pain and suffering. ונזכה לביאת גואל צדק בב"א.

Birthright trip for physically disabled a first

By ELI SHUPAK
Special to The CJN

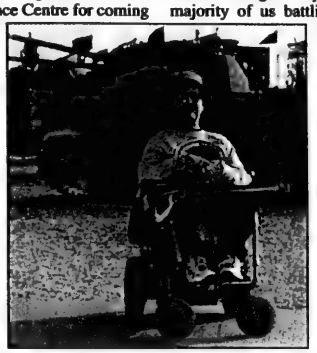
TORONTO — I consider it a miracle that I ever made it to Israel even though I was among almost 1,200 young adults from Canada who were accepted to the Birthright program last year. But then again, Israel is a nation where miracles happen.

Truthfully, getting to Israel was the last thing on my mind in the months leading up to the mid-February departure date. I had been hospitalized for nearly four weeks in the fall with pneumonia (a very serious illness for someone with my condition, Spinal Muscular Atrophy) and contracted an infection during that time which didn't clear up until early last month.

Once I was healthy enough to travel, the next step was finding a caregiver to accompany me on the 11-day trip. I was extremely fortunate to find an old friend I hadn't talked to in years.

Going into a foreign country on the other side of the world that was on the verge of war was a little bit unsettling, but I was not about to pass up this opportunity of a lifetime. As it turned out, the only time I felt the least bit uncomfortable being in Israel was on our last day in Rabin Square (the spot where Prime Minister Yitzhak Rabin was assassinated).

I owe a great deal of gratitude to the Canada Israel Experience Centre for coming up with a program that would accommodate people with physical disabilities. I'd heard prior to leaving just how inaccessible Israel was to people with mobility impairments. Though the seven handicapped participants in our group had their fair share of challenges, for the most part, we got around the country without too much difficulty. That's because of the outstanding job Eli Meiri did in working out the logistics of the trip.



Eli Shupak in Israel

"The preparations for this group started about six months ago," said Meiri, a special needs consultant the Canada Israel Experience Centre hired to properly prepare for the trip. "We had to plan everything ahead."

Sometimes even that didn't help as the group found out upon arriving at the Dead Sea Hyatt that the wheelchair accessible rooms had not been kept for us.

The three of us who changed rooms were quite satisfied when we found ourselves in the executive suites.

We spent our last two nights at the beautiful David Intercontinental in Tel Aviv, but got a dose of reality in between with a two-night stay on a kibbutz.

Our itinerary included events I would never have dreamed possible. I rode a zip line in my wheelchair, scared to death of the cable snapping with me in mid-air. I also went on a donkey ride at Kfar Kedem, driving up a ramp and going around the recreated ancient Galilean village on a cart.

The trip to Masada was a highlight, even though we encountered a sandstorm at the top of the 2000-year-old fortress.

We pushed ourselves to the limit to enjoy this Birthright experience, despite the majority of us battling colds and the elements throughout. The weather could not have been worse (it rained almost every day and was rather cool even for us Canadians), but our tour guide Roni Houbani would put things in perspective at Yad Vashem.

"I think about [the six million Jews who died in the Holocaust] today that cannot share these moments with me," Houbani said to us at the memorial where our picture was taken by the Jerusalem Post and published the next day as the first Birthright trip in the world for the physically handicapped.

"I'm sure that for all of them, they would rather stand in the cold wind. We are lucky to be freezing, some people are not. I very often think about them, the victims of the Holocaust and the soldiers who fought so we can be cold today in Israel, but alive."

Rachel Feld, a University of Toronto occupational therapy student who was on her 12th visit to Israel, her third as a madrichah, said to me that this trip was about putting her two passions together.

"I love passing on my passion for this country to other people," she said. "The fact that [this trip] allowed me to combine that with my desire to work with people with disabilities was a bonus.

"I think it's so important for people to experience Israel in this special way. I'm just so happy because many of these participants probably would never have gotten to Israel, and that would be just a crime."

Birthright program aids those with disabilities

By ELI SHUPAK
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — Adam Minsky says that one of the most important goals of the Birthright Israel program is to build community. And that means including people from all walks of Jewish life.

The director of Israel and Overseas Programs of UIA Federations Canada was largely responsible for the breakthrough last month allowing participants with both physical and developmental disabilities to take part in the Birthright Israel program for the first time.

"People with disabilities are an integral part of the community," said Minsky, who is based at the Canada Israel Experience Centre, a department of UIAFC. "Ensuring that they can participate in our Canada Israel Experience program is vital to our sense of community."

A total of seven people with physical handicaps and six caregivers from Ontario and Quebec made the trip. There were no applicants from the rest of the country. Fifteen clients from Thornhill's Reena Foundation, as well as five staff members and three volunteer mediators, were integrated into the non-disabled groups.

Arlene Margolese, Reena's manager of volunteer services and Judaic programming, who organized the delegation, said the "other kids were absolutely phenomenal. They included our guys in absolutely everything... and of course most important was the opportunity to visit Israel and to connect with their roots. It was phenomenal. They had an absolute blast."

'Other kids were absolutely phenomenal'

Reena participant Rebecca Hersh was particularly impressed with the beauty of Israel's plant life and the historic aspects of Jerusalem. "There is no other city like that," she said. "I felt as if I was home in my land."

For Jeremy Katz, also a Reena client, visiting the Kotel was a unique highlight. "When I touched the Western Wall, my fingers tingled. It was a very spiritual experience." He also noted that he "had lots of fun [and] met lots of cool people."

For the physically disabled participants, the cost of the undertaking was triple that of the standard Birthright program, with extra costs incurred from a specially adapted bus, building ramps to make important sites wheelchair accessible, paying for attendants, specially equipped hotel rooms, additional Israeli staff and consultants.

"It was a breakthrough for the Birthright trips and the Jewish community worldwide," said tour co-ordinator Eli Meiri, an Israeli crusader in tourism for people with special needs.

Most of the funding for both groups was supplied through two Birthright Israel grants for innovative programs. UIAFC provided the balance for the physically disabled participants; the Reena Foundation and UJA FEDERATION provided additional funds to cover staff and mediators' participation for the developmentally disabled group. Their volunteer mediators were former Birthright participants now giving of their free time at Reena for a year, noted Minsky.

"This was not a one-shot deal," said Minsky, who added that it will take two years to raise enough money to cover the additional costs of another trip. "We learned a tremendous amount by operating this program and I am eager to implement what we learned. I anticipate that it will happen every two or three years, given our difficulties finding enough eligible candidates."

Passover Food Ideas

Memories & traditions...

Memories and traditions play a more prominent role in the celebration of Passover than they do during most other Jewish holidays.

As we gather around the seder table, we retell the story of the Jews' exodus from Egypt. By eating matzah and refraining from eating chametz, we recall the haste in which the Jews left Egypt.

In conducting the seder, we also recall the traditions of our parents and grandparents. Decisions such as whether to serve celery, potatoes or eggs in salt water, what ingredients we use in our charoset and who hides the matzah are all based on our family traditions.

Throughout the seder we also, no doubt, remember parents, aunts, uncles, cousins and beloved friends who are no longer here to celebrate with us.

These are bittersweet memories. We mourn that their chair is empty, but we are comforted by the traditions they have brought to our table.

Food plays a central part in our memories. Our brisket recipe, our tzimmes, our seder side dishes and our desserts are often based on recipes our grandmothers used before us.

Even when we change a recipe – lighten it up, add a different spice, change the texture of the knaidlach – we recall that we have altered a dish that Bubbie made. Their signature dishes are always on our minds: How would they feel about this change?

This year, The CJN has attempted to bring you some of the Passover food traditions and current seder recipes of families from near and far. Some of these recipes may even become part of your own seder traditions.

The ingredients in all our recipes are acceptable for Passover use, and can be purchased kosher for Passover in most large Jewish communities.

From all of us at The CJN, enjoy these recipes. Chag kasher v'samayach.

The chicken can be frozen before or after it has been baked. Lois often packages the leftovers in pairs so she has the makings of a romantic dinner for Shabbat!

Seder from the Net

and parsley. Form into a log on foil and freeze for 4 hours or more. Flatten chicken breasts, one at a time, between layers of waxed paper or plastic wrap, using a meat mallet.

Place 1 tbsp. frozen margarine with seasonings 1/4 of the way down the long side of a chicken breast. Fold top portion of chicken breast down and fold sides in first before you fold down rest of chicken breast (like making a blintz). Dip chicken breast in matzah meal, then into egg wash, then into matzah meal a second time for a thicker coating.

Place on baking sheet and refrigerate for 30 minutes to an hour to cool chicken breast from handling. Heat oil in deep pan. Gently spoon-drop chicken bundles into hot oil and cook just until lightly brown, about 4 to 6 minutes. Drain on brown paper bag. Place on parchment paper lined baking sheet and bake in oven 25 minutes at 350.

Note: You can make a sauce of the margarine mixture thickened with potato starch and wine to go on plate before you place the chicken bundle on plate.

Nancy Berry of San Francisco is a frequent contributor to the list. She is a true "foodie." Nancy writes: "Our favourite Pesach recipe is potato kugelettes. It was originally from Patricia Unterman, a San Francisco restaurant critic and restaurateur. I guess you could use margarine, but schmaltz really makes the dish. I only make these at Pesach and Chanukah, so I splurge nutritionally on the schmaltz."

NANCY BERRY'S POTATO KUGELETTES

1 cup potatoes, grated and drained
1/4 cup onions, grated
2 eggs, well beaten
1 tsp. kosher salt
1/8 tsp. pepper, freshly ground
2 tbsp. chicken fat (schmaltz) chicken fat to grease tins matzah meal to dust tins

Preheat oven to 375. Combine all ingredients. Grease mini muffin tins with chicken fat and dust with matzah meal. Place 1 tbsp. of filling per muffin tin and bake for 25 minutes, until golden. Yield: 8 servings.

Beren Ornstein of Columbus, Ohio writes: "This recipe is from the classic archives. I made it two years ago (for Pesach) for my fiancé's cousin, who dropped in for dinner. She raved about them to my mother-in-law. It's so nice to have a non-matzah-related carb at the table during Pesach! I think it feeds about 4 as dinner, and 6 to 8 as a side dish. They are dense little things, and quite filling."

BEREN ORNSTEIN'S FAVOURITE PASSOVER POTATO GNOCCHI

Source: Esther Surdut's New Pesach Cookbook – Cape Town, South Africa

3 medium potatoes
salt to taste
1 egg lightly beaten
1/2 cup cake meal
1/2 cup potato flour (sift the 2 flours together)

PESTO SAUCE

1 1/2 cups basil leaves
2 cloves garlic
1/4 cup olive oil
1/2 cup salad oil
2-3 tbsp. pine nuts (walnuts can be substituted) about 1 cup grated cheddar cheese salt and freshly ground black pepper

Gnocchi: Boil potatoes till tender. Drain, peel and mash. Add the egg, salt and most of the flour, mix until you have a soft dough that is not sticky and is easy to work with. Let dough rest for half hour.

Divide dough into 4 portions (or more) and roll each portion into a long sausage shape about 3/4-in. thick. Cut into 1-in. slices and press against the prongs of a fork to make indentations on the gnocchi. Bring a large saucepan of lightly salted water to the boil.

Add gnocchi a few at a time until they rise to the surface. Remove with a slotted spoon. Place in a serving dish, add the pesto and garnish with extra grated cheese and some olives.

Pesto Sauce: Blend all the ingredients together in a food processor. If the sauce is too thick, thin down with a little water.

Lori Schankerman of Indianapolis writes: "I am responding with my coffee cup by my side! This kugel is great hot or cold and I use it as a side for dairy meals for breakfast, lunch or dinner."

LORI SCHANKERMAN'S DAIRY FARFEL PUDDING

5 eggs
1/3 cup sugar
3 cups farfel
3 cups creamed cottage cheese
1 1/2 cups sour cream
1/3 cup melted margarine
3/4 cup raisins
3/4 cup apricot preserves
3/4 cup chopped walnuts
2 tbsp. sugar
1 tsp. cinnamon

In mixing bowl, beat eggs until light. Gradually beat in 1/3 cup sugar until fluffy. Soak farfel in cold water until softened. Squeeze out excess water. Add farfel, cottage cheese, sour cream, margarine, raisins and preserves to egg mixture; blend well. Pour into a 9 x 13 inch baking dish. Mix nuts, sugar and cinnamon together. Sprinkle on top of farfel mixture. Bake in a 350-degree oven for 1 hour uncovered. Serve warm or cold.

POTATO KUGELETTES: A great side dish.

Weight Watchers with a flair

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Special to The CJN

Weekly Weight Watchers meetings at Beth David B'nai Israel Beth Am Congregation are unique for two reasons.

Not only are the meetings – to members' knowledge – the only ones in North America that are structured according to kosher guidelines, but they also have a resident caterer.

Miriam Myerowitz of Miriam's Table, Beth David's caterer, is an active member of the group, and according to Gloria Dadoun who brought the meetings in through Beth David Sisterhood, "Miriam is very forthcoming with recipes."

The group, led by Marlene Landa, has about 120 active members who attend one of two Wednesday meetings.

Members do not have to be Beth David members, nor do they have to be Jewish. "They just have to want to lose weight," says Landa.

Meetings often revolve around Shabbat – cholent comes up at least once every two weeks – holidays and simchas, says Landa.

"Members feel comfortable here. They all understand our food challenges. It is an excellent program because members of any ethnic group can fit the program into their lives.

Weight Watchers revolves around a point system, she says. "All food is given points, and all people are given a points range according to their weight. It is a sensible and successful long-term program."

Meetings are reactive, says Landa. "We start off with a particular theme, but quickly change topic according to members' needs," says Landa.

Passover, she says, is a very popular topic. "I stress that it does not have to be difficult to keep to the program throughout the celebration. The food choices are there, and you can make the right choice.

"If you substitute bread products for matzah products, it is not all that different. The difficulty comes when we are cooking and we want to taste. During meetings we talk about strategies to get around this.

"Food is wonderful, but we can celebrate in many ways. The real joy of Passover is to celebrate with people. We do not have to eat everything; we have to learn to say 'no thank you.' At the meetings, members get the wherewithal and the courage to say no," says Landa.

Myerowitz developed the following recipes specifically for her Weight Watchers class.

STUFFED GEFILTE FISH
(3 points for a 3-oz. portion)

1 whitefish butterflied and deboned
½ lb. red Atlantic salmon
2 egg whites
3 scallions chopped
2 tbsp. matzah meal
½ tsp. salt
¼ tsp. pepper

Mix the last seven ingredients together, place in centre of whitefish. Roll fish in parchment and bake in 350-degree oven for 30 minutes.

STRAWBERRY MANGO SUMMER SALAD
(2 points each serving)

1 large bunch asparagus
1 mango
1 pint strawberries
½ cup raspberry vinaigrette

Clean and blanch asparagus, cool and cut into 2-inch pieces. Hull, wash and slice strawberries. Peel and cut mango into chunks. Place in a serving dish, cover and refrigerate until 1 hour before serving. Remove from refrigerator and let warm to room temperature. Serve on a bed of lettuce and drizzle dressing on. Four servings.

Dressing:

20 raspberries
1 tbsp. oil
¼ cup water
2 lemon juices
¼ tsp. salt
1 packet sugar substitute

Mix in food processor until well blended.

CONFETTI MUFFINS
(3 points each)

½ tsp. salt
¼ tsp. pepper
egg whites
1 lb. peeled potatoes (grated)
2 tbsp. oil
1 medium cooking onion chopped
2 oz. grated carrot
2 oz. diced red peppers
1 tsp. chopped parsley
2 buds of garlic chopped

Sauté vegetables and garlic in tbsp. oil. Add sautéed vegetables to the grated potatoes, add egg whites and seasoning and place into muffin cups, which have been sprayed with light oil. Bake in 350-degree oven for 30 minutes. This recipe can be made in an 8x8-inch pan and baked as a kugel. Makes 6 muffins.

PASSOVER... AND FIBRE

By BARBARA SILVERSTEIN
Special to The CJN

In the early '90s, a national food retailer tweaked to the fact that there was a sizable Jewish community living in Toronto's east end. The store made its first overture to the community at Passover in 1993.

Community members were surprised to discover that the local branch of this grocery chain had set up its first Passover display. The selection, however, was limited to what presumably was considered to be the holiday's bare culinary necessities. Only two items were offered – matzah and prune juice.

The matzah was an obvious choice, but it appears that prune juice has also become a staple of Passover fare. All that matzah can be very constipating, but nutrition experts and culinary experts say people can maintain regularity during the holiday without guzzling the prune juice.

They just need to add fibre to meals.

In the book To Life! Setting a New Standard for Delectable Healthy Eating within Cherished Kosher Traditions (Culture Concepts), authors Thelma Barer-Stein, Esther Schwartz and Risa Vandersluis offer simple tips for increasing fibre intake at Passover.

They recommend various ways of incorporating vegetables, which are high in fibre. For instance, fresh vegetable chunks can be kept in the refrigerator to be eaten as a snack or appetizer, while shredded vegetables, such as cabbage, can be added to soups, salads and casseroles.

Other tips include experimenting with higher fibre whole-wheat matzah in recipes, and when possible, substituting the high-fibre variety for the more traditional low-fibre white matzah; eating whole fruits rather than drinking juices; and instead of using sugar when stewing fresh fruit, adding dry fruits like apricots and prunes, which are high in fibre and natural sugar.

The following recipes are teamed together to make up a highly flavourful and fibre-rich Passover supper. The main course, chicken marvelosa, boneless chicken breasts in a herbed apricot marinade, is a recipe from Lynn Mendelson's new cookbook, Chicken! Chicken! Chicken! And More Chicken! (Whitecap Books).

Add some fresh fruit for dessert to cap off this the healthful meal, a Passover menu that may be well-appreciated after two days of feasting on traditional seder fare.

CHICKEN MARVELOSA

From Chicken! Chicken! Chicken! And More Chicken!

5 full boneless, skinless chicken breasts (cut in half)
1 recipe herbed apricot marinade (see below)
¼ cup dry white wine
½ to ¾ cup brown sugar
1 tbsp. cilantro, finely chopped for garnish
4 bay leaves

HERBED APRICOT MARINADE

½ to ⅔ cup minced garlic
1 cup olive oil
1 cup red wine
1 cup pitted green or black olives
¼ cup fresh parsley
2 tbsp. dry oregano
1½ cups apricots
1½ cups prunes
2 tbsp. apricot preserves

Blend together garlic, oil, wine, olives and parsley in a food processor using a metal blade. Remove from processor and place in bowl. Add oregano, apricots, prunes and preserves. Marinate chicken breasts in the herbed apricot marinade for at least two hours. Remove from marinade and reserve marinade for later use.

Heat non-stick fry pan on medium-high heat and add chicken breasts one at a time. Fry each side until the chicken becomes opaque on the outside. Turn over and repeat. It should look slightly blackened.

Passover Food Ideas

Recipes for the community from COR

The Kosher Information Service of the Kashruth Council of Canada (COR) affiliated with the Vaad Harabonim of Toronto, and UJA FEDERATION of Greater Toronto, publishes a COR holiday information and recipe pamphlet for each major holiday.

This year's recipes include:

BUTTERNUT SQUASH SOUP

4 tbsp. oil
1 large onion, sliced
2 ribs celery, sliced
2 butternut squash, seeded and cut into 2-inch pieces
2 tbsp. potato starch
6 cups pareve chicken stock or water
¼ tsp. pepper
¼ tsp. thyme
¼ tsp. rosemary toasted farfel (see recipe below)
Garnish:
4 tbsp. chopped flat parsley

Heat oil in saucepan. Sauté onion, add celery and squash; cook 5 minutes, stirring constantly. Remove from heat, blend in potato starch slowly. Add chicken stock or water slowly, stirring constantly. Add pepper, thyme and rosemary. Return to medium heat. Cover and cook until squash is tender (about 20 minutes). Process in blender or food processor until smooth. Reheat. Garnish with chopped parsley. Serve with toasted farfel. Serves 8-10.

Toasted Farfel:
2 cups matzah farfel
2 egg yolks, beaten
½ tsp. salt

Preheat oven to 350. Combine ingredients. Spread out on foil-lined cookie sheet and bake until golden, about 20-25 minutes. Serve in your favourite soup or salad. Yield: 2 cups.

BAKED STUFFED POTATOES

6 large baking potatoes
oil to rub potatoes
2 tbsp. oil
1 small onion, finely chopped
¼ lb. mushrooms, finely chopped
salt and pepper to taste
⅓ cup pareve chicken stock
Garnish:
2 tbsp. chopped flat parsley
paprika

Preheat oven to 425. Scrub potatoes thoroughly; dry and rub with oil. Place on a cookie sheet and bake for 1 hour or until fork tender. Cut a thin slice lengthwise from the top of each potato. Scoop out the pulp, being careful not to break the skins. Mash the pulp in mixmaster.

In 2 tbsp. hot oil, sauté onion for 5 minutes; add mushrooms and sauté another 5 minutes. Add salt, pepper and stock. Mix well and add to the mashed potatoes. Refill potato skins; flute with a fork.

Before serving, preheat oven to 400. Place on cookie sheet and place in oven, watching carefully until the tops are golden brown. Remove from oven and place on a platter. Sprinkle lightly with chopped parsley or paprika. Serves 6.

PASSOVER BROWNIES

3 eggs
1 cup sugar
⅓ cup oil
1 tsp. vanilla
¼ cup matzah meal
¼ cup potato starch
⅓ cup cocoa
½ cup chopped nuts (optional)

Preheat oven to 350. Grease an 8-inch or 9-inch square pan. Beat eggs, add sugar gradually; beat until thick. Add oil and vanilla; blend well. Fold in remaining ingredients. Pour into prepared pan. Bake for 30 minutes or until set. Cool and cut into squares. Yield: 25 squares.

Remove from fry pan and place in shallow baking pan. Continue until all breasts are completed. Pour dry white wine over top, sprinkle brown sugar on top of the wine, and then put the reserved marinade on top of the sugar. Add bay leaves to the casserole. Place in 375-degree oven and bake for 40 minutes.

Remove chicken breasts, slice across the diagonal into thin slices. Return to pan and refrigerate until you are ready to reheat for the seder or another Passover meal. Garnish with cilantro and serve.

CARROT AND YAM CASSEROLE

From To Life!

If baking, preheat oven to 350. Combine ingredients in an oven casserole or in skillet for stove-top cooking.

1 finely chopped onion
3 cups of carrots sliced in rounds
2 large yams, peeled and cubed
½ tsp. salt
pinch of pepper
½ cup honey
2½ cups water
¼ cup matzah meal
¼ cup potato starch
¼ cup cold water
½ cup drained canned pineapple chunks (optional)

Combine onion, carrots, yams, salt, pepper, honey and water in an oven casserole or skillet. Cover and bake 2½ to 3 hours or cook on low heat on stove top. Shake occasionally to prevent sticking, but do not stir. Remove some liquid and whisk together with matzah meal, potato starch and water. Add thickened juices and pineapple to vegetable mixture. Distribute pineapple pieces evenly. Bake uncovered until brown or cook on stove top an additional 30 minutes.

McCord Museum receives donation from fashion designer

The McCord Museum's internationally recognized Collection of Costume and Textiles in Montreal has received a donation of five garments created by renowned Toronto fashion designer Edith Strauss.

Edith Strauss has been active in Canadian fashion design since 1947, when she became executive designer of Canada's largest dress manufacturing company in Montreal. In 1965, she moved to Toronto and launched her own self-named label. In 1990, the city of Toronto recognized her accomplishments with the Fashion Industry Achievement Award.

Edith Strauss

Her collection was sold at Saks Fifth Avenue in New York in the early 1970s, and in 1981 she became the first Canadian designer to sell a collection in Japan. Strauss continues to design two collections a year from her elegant studio on Carlton Street in Toronto.

Most notable of the garments received by the McCord is a printed cotton voile dress in shades of turquoise, blue, yellow, orange and pink. The dress, dating from the mid-1970s, is gathered into a yoke with square neckline, and has three-quarter length sleeves and a matching scarf. The garment was actually part of the designer's own wardrobe; photographs document it as having been worn by a model and by Strauss herself.

Another noteworthy garment, a white silk crêpe dress, won an Eedee Award from the Ontario Fashion Council in 1970. The dress has a deep-fringed hemline and matching fringed scarf. Pink- and mauve-beaded trim border the sleeves and the hemline above the fringe. The dress drew a great deal of attention from the industry: Lisa Taylor, then chairman of the Fashion Council in Ottawa, referred to it as the most original design, an expression of the transition period from the Mini to the Midi Look.

The other three dresses date from the 1980s. From 1982, a black silk chiffon floor-length evening dress has a skirt embellished with silver and a hand-painted design in mauve, pink and white. The rest date from the same period, all made in original top-of-the-line fabrics, exclusive to the designer.

The five garments and extensive photographic documentation were recently donated by Strauss. "Of the vast range of objects that museums collect, costume generates a particularly strong emotional response from viewers, and appeals to a wide range of museum visitors," she said.

"It is highly significant that a member of the fashion industry has chosen to make this donation to the McCord Museum," said Victoria Dickenson, executive director of the McCord.

The McCord Collection of Costume and Textiles includes more than 16,400 objects made or worn in Canada during the past three centuries. The collection also contains costume accessories and domestic textiles such as embroidered samplers and quilts. Highlights of the Collection are currently on display in the permanent exhition Simply Montréal, Glimpses of a Unique City, and will also be featured in an upcoming exhibition on the history of men's fashion.

The McCord Museum is located at 690 Sherbrooke St. West. Opening hours are Tuesday through Friday from 10 a.m. to 6 p.m., and from 10 a.m. to 5 p.m. on weekends. Admission fees (including tax) are $8.50 for adults, $5 for students, $17 for families, $6 for seniors and $2 for children between 7 and 12 years old. Children of 6 and under are admitted free, and admission is free on Saturday mornings between 10 a.m. and noon.

This hand-painted gown of pure silk is now at the McCord Museum.

Seminars for stitchers

The Pomegranate Guild of Judaic Textiles is presenting Seminars for Stitchers, a choice of workshops with a Judaic theme.

The full-day event features a choice of one of four workshops including A Beaded Kiddush Cup, Crazy Quilting, Silk Ribbon Embroidery and Soft-Sculpture Dolls.

Each workshop will be led by leading instructors in the field. Participants will learn how to use these techniques to create or embellish their own Judaic objects.

Rona Garson's Beaded Kiddush Cup seminar will teach peyote beadweaving stitch and stringing techniques to cover a wine glass with seed beads and produce a kiddush cup with a Judaic design.

Haya Nativ's seminar, Crazy Quilting, will teach one of the easiest, most creative and fun quilting techniques using fabric leftovers of all kinds to make a new work of art. The finished project can be used as a pillow, tote bag or a Judaic article such as a challah cover or a tefillin bag.

Penny Beren's seminar on silk ribbon embroidery will showcase the basic techniques for threading and knotting silk ribbon onto needles. Silk ribbon embroidery can be used to embellish quilts, bags, boxes, photo frames and clothing.

Lucy Garvin's seminar, Fenwick: A Jolly Jester, will allows participants to make their own version of this jolly jester while learning the basics of cloth dollmaking, such as how to needlesculpt a face, create poseable hands and moveable joints.

The Pomegranate Guild welcomes people of all ages and skill levels. The seminars will be held May 6, from 9:30 a.m. to 3:30 p.m. at Shaarei Shomayim Synagogue, 470 Glencairn Ave., Toronto. For registration and costs call 416-489-4689. Space is limited and the registration deadline is April 6.

The Pomegranate Guild of Judaic Textiles is a registered non-profit organization.

Beauty Shop

News, News, News! MAC Cosmetics opens its flagship location at Queen and John streets (Toronto). This 2,000-square-foot store offers a complete line of cosmetics as well as the MAC pro line – an industry professional collection. The new in-store design concept is exactly like a photographer's studio.

"We wanted to create a linear dynamic by architecturally 'linking' two floors together," says Regis Pean, store director for MAC.

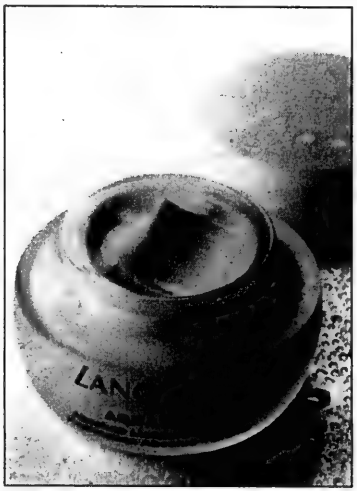
The store has moveable makeup units, a "cat walk" and customer play areas, and it can be easily transformed into an event space.

Shiseido launches a completely new line of makeup. Their advanced revolutionary technology provides makeup that reflects light in a unique way to increase radiance, and colours that look the same after applied as they do in their container. These terrific formulas truly create makeup that illuminates features.

"Colour is back in a big way this spring," says Aerin Lauder. There is no doubt that this makeup maven knows exactly what she is talking about – rainbows of colours are everywhere. However, vivid shades are mostly sheer, so lipsticks often resemble gloss, and eye shadows veil the eye with the most delicate tones.

Eyes are sexy, yet still feminine and ladylike. Full pouty lips painted with fresh melon shades are most popular. Lip pencil is still essential, but is less defined. Nails gleam with sheer colours of pink and coral.

A facial, either at home or done professionally, is a must. Dry, flaky skin tends to accumulate over the winter months. Enjoy getting rid of the excess flakes by turning your bathroom into a sensuous spa. The new Estee Lauder Spa Collection has amazing products that will renew your body from head to toe. The scents are great and the experience quite uplifting.



CAROL'S TIPS

SKIN CARE: Lancaster introduces a fabulous line of skin care named Aquamilk. Cleansers, masks and moisturizers all contain Lancaster's exclusive Bio Milk Complex, a rich natural source of essential hydration and nourishment. Lactic acid, coconut milk, rice milk and honey all combine to feed your skin everything it needs for looking great and feeling terrific.

Lise Watier's lovely new cream called Crème Hiver with SPF 20 protects and hydrates all day. Also from Watier is a new hand cream that is like wearing gloves – the name Hydra-Secours Mains. It also claims that over time it will reduce age spots.

Elizabeth Arden's Extreme Conditioning Cream SPF 15 is perfect for all weather extremes, inside or out. I recently used it on a very long airplane trip and it indeed rescued my skin from the dry stagnant air. My skin felt soothed and totally nurtured.

A must-have from Shiseido – The Skincare Line is their Multi-Energizing Cream with its silky texture. It will pamper your skin in the most comforting way.

Christian Dior has two three-dimensional breakthroughs. Model Lift Nuit performs triple firming action focused on relaxation and optimum firmness, and promises to define facial contours within one month. Body Model Ultra-Firming Multi-Sensory Gel, is one of the first cosmetic "Home-Trainers." It has a tensing effect, sculpting power and contouring action – very interesting!

Lancome introduces Renergie Lift Contour, a marvelous anti-aging cream that has a dual action to provide correction for both wrinkles and lack of firmness.

Biotherm's Age Fitness is great and has all the vital force of the olive tree (known for its longevity and resistance) concentrated in one jar. This is truly a Bio undertaking that promises to make skin look younger and livelier in one week.

FOUNDATION: Try Quo's Foundation Primer under-all foundation. It will allow smoother application and longer wear.

Elizabeth Arden's Flawless Finish Makeup Stick SPF8 is a cream-to-powder foundation stick that glides on as full makeup or dots for quick touch ups. It provides a semi-matte finish and is travel friendly.

Helena Rubenstein laboratories have developed a high-tech foundation, which in a single step knows how to mattify oily zones and soften dry zones – its name – Double Agent.

This combo effect seems to be popular this spring as Estee Lauder introduces an Equalizer Smart Makeup for combination skin. It expertly monitors oily and dry zones, and thus simultaneously helps skin stay balanced and fresh.

Lancaster's new Treatment Tinted Pencil is fabulous to camouflage blemishes or any discolouration.

SWEET CHEEKS: Minute Blush in Minute Watermelon from Lauder's Pretty Please collection is gorgeous and a dream to apply.

Dab Watier's Sandy Gold Glitter Gel high on your cheekbones and/or be daring one night and smooth a little on your cleavage.

Elizabeth Arden's spring look is focused on the cheeks with a healthy hint of pink or coral. Check out pink cashmere – it's the ultimate in femininity.

Colour Pinch from L'Oreal is the fun of the season. This liquid colour looks just like kids' play, but the effect is stellar. Dior's Blush Final Diorlight in Natural Gold will definitely give you that sun-kissed look.

EYES: L'Oreal's Honey Kissed eye smoker is amazing to brighten any eye design. Eye Paints by MAC, like Canton Candy and Bamboom are a must see.

Dior's Patchworkmania is a five-colour compact that will dazzle your eyes; it's also a perfect travel companion. Another new product from Dior this season is a great mascara – Long'Optic. It actually does create extra length and gloss while moisturizing and strengthening your lashes – very lush and sexy!

LUSCIOUS LIPS: MAC's fleshpot lipstick is a great base shade to start with and is equally fabulous on its own. Check out "cocktail" lipglass stain; it looks just like a grape crush – very yummy.

Exclusive to Holt Renfrew, Estee Lauder's Pure Colour Lipstick and Nail Lacquer lines expand with luscious new shades encased in their very distinctive packaging.

It's a reinterpretation of Lauder's signature look – a golden cap over a transparent cubic bottom. And don't miss Lauder's Go Pout Collection with five stunning new colours – check out sweet potato and cupcake.

Faces' palette of four lip-glosses enclosed in one compact are perfect shades for all occasions.

Hermes presents the perfect red lipstick, not too bold, not too bright, not too dark, it is simply beautifying for all skin types. The texture is silky and its staying power is great!

Chanel has created a very high-tech new lipstick that goes beyond the limits of colour. This sensational collection is called Infrarouge. Its uniqueness is about the concentration of pigments that create an intense colour that almost vibrates. The texture is ultra-fine and feels like a second skin, and wait until you see the colour story – spectacular!

TOOLS OF THE TRADE: Quo introduces a fabulous line of brushes and accessories. "Makeup brushes are an investment," says Derek Selby, national training manager for Quo.

No doubt, using proper brushes will provide you with an easier and better application. Clean your brushes regularly with Cleaning Lady, another highlight from Quo.

HAIR: This season makes us realize that long, sexy tresses are yesterday's news. To get the picture just take a look at Courtney Cox or Faith Hill.

Daniel of Salon Daniel (79 Yorkville Ave., Toronto) says that this spring, hair will bounce with wave and curl. The look is alluring, sexy and very feminine.

Colours are shades of everything bold – red will be redder and blonde, blonder says Joanne Skillin, colour designer at Salon Daniel.

Redken's In the Loop curl booster will help enhance and revitalize naturally wavy or curly hair. L'Oreal Professional launches Liss Control Smooth Gel-Cream and Intense Control Soothing Serum from Tec Ni Art.

These two great products provide straightness that lasts, curls that behave and a 24-hour anti-humidity action.

FRAGRANCE: The folks at Davidoff have travellers on their mind this spring. Both his and hers Cool Water Travel Kits are absolutely fabulous, user friendly and the scents are gorgeous. The packaging is simply brilliant.

This spring's hot trends

Don't be afraid to splurge on fine fabrics and vibrant hues for this coming spring and summer. Below is a sampling of the season's trends.

Colours: You can't go wrong with khaki because it goes with spring's military trend. Furthermore, if you want to indulge yourself by sporting striking tops and accessories, treat yourself to neutral skirts, jackets and pants in variations of beige, grey and blue.

Pastel hues will be a welcome change as will the light wraps after a dreary winter of heavy coats and wooly apparel. And, of course, black and white will also be in style and are great shades for accessorizing. But if you want to liven things up in your warm weather wardrobe, wear purple, turquoise, lime, pink or red and don't forget the pin-stripes and prints to add some dazzle.

Jewelry: Don't forget the neckline – jewelry will add a dash of pizzazz and colour to your ensemble. Necklaces, chains, link bracelet watches, rock-bead bracelets in jewel-like hues and the charm bracelet are all in fashion this summer.

Shoes: Metallic bone, spike heels, sling-back pumps, open toe sandals, leather and novelty fabrics are among the galaxy of shoe styles in fashion this coming season. There is something new and fresh for everyone in a style that is comfortable and attractive.

Handbags: The choice of handbags, purses and wallets is amazing this spring. Some of the items in store windows on New York's Fifth Avenue are the clutch with the snap closure, the faux-lizard leather single-handle purse and Chanel's perennial mini-boxed bag. Besides leather, you will find beautiful blends of cotton, linen, canvas and woven fabrics in purses of every conceivable style. In addition to totes, the little wrist bags were runaway favourites in numerous designer collections this spring.

Sweaters and tops: Cardigans and sleeveless tops with turtle necks in cotton, lycra, silk and other stretch-knit combinations are now lining the shelves. These tops are perfect for adding to a suit as they come in stunning shades of turquoise, pink, purple and lime. Button-down stretch shirts with collars and long sleeves have become a classic item in every wardrobe. Unlike clothes in the '80s, with their heavy shoulder pads, this year's look is much softer.

Pants: Pants come in a variety of styles to suit all figures. If you like drawstring, elasticized waists, front-fly belted pants or just a more conventional style, you won't have trouble finding the fabric or cut you admire most.

Skirts: This season, skirts are in a variety of lengths and styles – above the knee, at the knee, ankle-length, straight, flared and with colourful prints – to please all tastes.

Dresses: The shirt dress is back and this tailored item will take you to work, out to lunch and even out to dinner. Fashioned with a tailored shirt-style collar, long sleeves and button-down bodice, this frock comes in cotton, crêpe de chine or jersey. It's usually belted at the waist and some even boast breast pockets.

Rouge Hermes is a most sensual scent. Its floral and amber notes unfold with an extremely feminine sensibility.

Chanel has created Coco Mademoiselle, a new fragrance, completely different from Coco. It's a fresh oriental composition that is modern and very elegant. Oxygene, the latest woman's fragrance from Lanvin is a breath of fresh air with a vitality all of its own. It's really quite energizing.

Spring Fashion

A fashion timeline tucked into a pocket-sized monograph

By ELAINE COHEN
Business and Supplements Co-ordinator

For generations, garment gurus would bone up on fashion history by leafing through industry leaflets or sifting through publications in library archives. Since the '90s, the Internet has been the research tool of choice. But it still takes hours of surfing to find fashion data devoid of trivia and advertising hype.

Andrew Tucker and Tamsin Kingswell's hardcover, pocket-sized monograph, Fashion – a crash course, Raincoast Books Canada, 2000, $22.95 fills a void in the fashion literature marketplace.

Tucker, the author of The London Fashion Book, a history of British trends, teaches at St. Martin's School of Art, and writes for the Guardian in London. Co-author Kingswell is features editor at the fashion "bible," Draper's Record. Their wealth of knowledge on the subject is evident.

In Fashion – a crash course, the authors divulge developments by Dior, Chanel, Versace, and others, as well as details on breakthroughs such as nylon, the miniskirt and punk. Colourful illustrations enhance the well-documented text that traces the tortuous path initiated by designer Charles Worth in 1845.

Worth was the first designer to present summer and winter collections, use live models and sell designs as paper patterns for the export market.

Shopping became a form of recreation when department stores were introduced to the masses early in the 20th century. In the United States, tailor Herman Bergdorf joined forces with Edwin Goodman. Herbert Marcus and his sister and brother-in-law opened Neiman Marcus. In Britain, Harrods evolved from a grocery store in 1849 to become the first department store to introduce a "moving staircase" in 1898.

The terms "bespoke, sartorial elegance" stem from Britain's Savile Row, the bastion of male fashion since the days of Beau Brummel (1778-1840). By 1940, Savile Row lost out to Carnaby Street. The bespoke (custom-made) suit became fashionable again in the 1980s and is still regarded as one of Britain's biggest style statements.

When miniskirts hit the runway in 1960, so did matching hosiery. Designer Mary Quant produced her own line of micromesh and floral motif hosiery in 1965.

While the mini suited some better than others, so did the "military" look. Military surplus stores sprang up in the 1950s and the college crowd relished everything from bomber jackets to big black boots.

Irish designer Edward Molyneux introduced the sleek sheath dress in the 1930s. One of his customers, Wallis Simpson, caused a constitutional crisis in Britain by seducing the king. Molyneux, who favoured navy blue and black signature easy-to-wear, designed Simpson's trousseau.

Pierre Balmain, who set up his own couture house in 1945, favoured the same cool elegance as Molyneux. He cracked the American market and designed sportswear for Brigitte Bardot and Marlene Dietrich. During the '60s, Balmain also designed evening dresses made from organza with guipure lace.

By the 1950s, consumers clamoured for inexpensive, easy-care synthetics – nylon, rayon, acrylic. Ecological movements prompted people to take a second look at the chemical processes involved in manufacturing man-made fibres. Subsequently, many in the trade returned to natural fibres that breathe, wear well, and feel good.

Textile technology improved in the '80s when modified fibres like lycra and tencel were introduced.

Every decade has its portable icon (purse or handbag), the authors report. According to Tucker and Kingswell, Prada, Gucci, and Fendi are seen as fashion houses, but in reality their clothing sales rarely make up more than 25 percent of the industry share.

The authors compliment American contemporaries Calvin Klein, Tommy Hilfiger, Ralph Lauren, and Donna Karan for their expertise in marketing. For instance, they point out Donna Karan's discovery was combining jersey with lycra, to appeal to active women.

"Her bodysuits and sarongs were integral to the body-consciousness of the late 1980s, while allowing the wearers a certain voluptuousness by hiding their worst features," the book states.

The more affordable DKNY collection launched in 1988 proved lucrative for the company.

The authors' honesty is another highlight of this captivating book. They substantiate their statements, whether for or against a particular style, stylist or trend.

For example, the authors paint a vivid portrait of Gabrielle "Coco" Chanel, "the greatest designer of the 20th century." They credit Chanel (1883-1972) with transforming jersey from men's underwear into pared-down luxury sportswear and creating the first fragrance to receive worldwide acclaim. As for personality, a photo caption says it all: "Coco in 1931, thinking up her next bitchy bon mot."

Evaluating the work of designer Gianni Versace (1946-97), they write: "Versace's signature style combined an understanding of cutting and draping that avoided the stolid beiges and ecrus of his compatriot and rival Armani, opting instead for bright satin, chain mail and rococo prints."

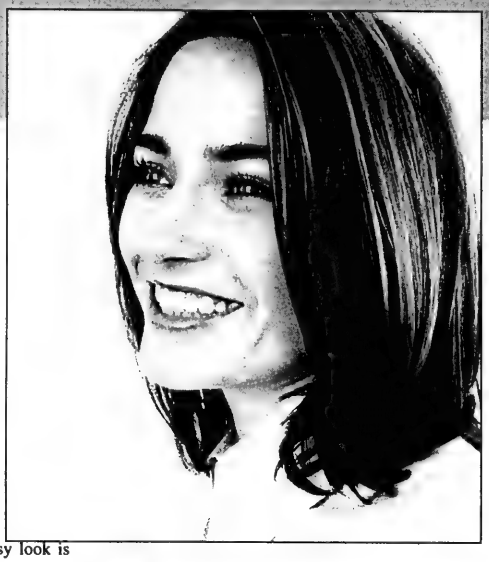
SPRING means it's time for a new look

News Canada



As the winter months melt away, many Canadians crave a fresh new look to start the Spring/Summer season.

According to a survey conducted by Schwarzkopf Professional Ltd., an international leader in hair colour and care, 63 percent of Canadians colour their hair because they feel it's either time for a change or they want to boost their self-confidence.

Schwarzkopf suggests the key look of the season, a textured cut with multiple colours.

"Getting a cut with lots of texture accentuated with multiple colours is a quick and easy way to update your look," says Ray Plunkett, technical director of Schwarzkopf Professional Ltd.

Regardless of length, textured shapes provide movement and definition. "For long hair, textured cuts with simple, defined lines are hot, like those of singer LeAnn Rimes and actor Claire Danes. For short hair, a controlled, messy look is in," advises Plunkett.

Short cuts with lots of shape are perfect for individuals with fine, weightless hair.

This season, vibrant multi-colours, such as a combination of blue-black and light-based red shades, best complement the trendy, textured cuts.

Another popular look this season is the classic sun-kissed look. "Using a combination of blonde and copper shades is an excellent choice for individuals with warm skin tones," says Plunkett.

Lighter hues, like those of actress Kirsten Dunst and Cameron Diaz, brighten the face, creating the perfect look.

In contrast, those individuals with cool tones, such as Winona Ryder, can update their look with a combination of blue-black and light-based red colours. This colour combination, as seen on Demi Moore, offers a sophisticated look that works best with short, textured hair.

Although women currently dominate the hair colour industry, men with coloured hair will soon be making their presence known in Canada.

"In Europe, men are taking advantage of hair colour, using it to change and update their look," says Plunkett. "Men are the fastest growing segment in the hair colour industry."

Using a variety of shades, like members of the Canadian pop group The Moffatts, men can use hair colour to complement natural skin tones, creating a subtle, yet stylish look.

ORTHODOX FASHION:

Fashion designer Jodi Weisleder takes great pride in her line of clothing which follows Orthodox Jewish rules of modesty. While stylish, beautiful and contemporary, the Jodi line keeps sleeves below the elbows, skirts below the knees and no low-cut dresses. In addition Weisleder adheres to the Biblical law of Shatnez which prohibits mixing wool and linen.

Finding clothes for husky boys

Many overweight or big-boned children have difficulty finding "cool" clothes that fit them.

These boys and girls often resort to wearing unfashionable, baggy clothing like sweat pants, or adult-sized outfits, that don't fit properly.

Thanks to some innovative designers, there are now lines of stylish clothing in "husky" sizes for boys.

One retailer who carries this kind of boyswear is Paul Spiar, owner of Crawford Boys. "We specialize in boyswear only. This allows us to devote the floor space and resources to clothing geared specifically for husky boys," Spiar says.

"We place large, in-depth orders with our suppliers, and then they are able to supply us with clothing that is designed and cut for husky boys."

Several customers have expressed their gratitude and appreciation for Crawford's products and the attention given by his staff.

Spiar reports that compared to menswear manufacturers, there are relatively few manufacturers of boys' clothing and of these, only a small percentage are willing to focus on clothing for husky boys.

"This is due to lack of demand from retailers, not [lack] of a viable market. Suits, sport jackets, dress and casual pants, shirts, – these are the things we sell."

Providing a variety of clothing in husky sizes is only one part of the challenge of specializing in husky clothing. Store owners and their staff must be willing to respond compassionately and patiently to young boys, who are usually self-conscious about their weight and body shape, Spiar notes.

"Some of the husky boys we see are comfortable with their form, but many come in with attitudes ranging from resignation and apathy to belligerence," Spiar says.

"Staff must be able to deal with all the boys with patience and empathy. It takes a special type of person to do this. It is important that these young boys believe that we take their concerns seriously and are looking out for their best interest."

Spiar is emphatic in his belief that wearing properly fitted and stylish clothing is an important component to gaining self-esteem, and helps kids fit in with peer groups.

"The better you feel about yourself, the more you are able to accomplish."

He recommends parents do some investigation to find which stores offer clothing suitable for their children in combination with an experienced, caring staff who can offer their time and advice.

ICRF fashion show a success

By FRANCES GOODMAN PELLATT
Special to The CJN

It was loud, bright and provocative. Judging by the catcalls, whistles and applause, it was also what the crowd wanted.

Close to 60 members of GenerationNext, aged 17 to 24, recently presented Honesty of the Innocence, the seventh-annual fashion show for the Israel Cancer Research Fund (ICRF), raising $15,000.

The enthusiastic fund-raisers began organizing six months ago, soliciting fashions, selecting music and choreographing dances. The result was a compilation of routines that were professional and well-co-ordinated.

Two shows were performed at the Shaar Hashomayim Synagogue in Montreal for a crowd of about 1,000 people. The show's models displayed an wide array of ensembles while dancing to the pulsating sounds of Fiona Apple, Bjork and the Backstreet Boys, presented by Superior Sound/Kloda Productions.

The clothing – from Boutique EXTC, Popsariz, Fidel, House of Blue, Diesel, Lithium, Groggy, Parasuco, Miss Sixty, Energie, Silicon, Ezekiel, Jane Doe and Riley – revealed that the look for spring and summer is fun and comfortable for both sexes.

Slacks for girls are body-hugging, with flared bottoms reminiscent of the bell-bottoms of the '60s. But today's flares have slits at either the front of the leg, the back or on the side, with zipper or snap closures.

Skirts are in and are slinky and sexy, with hems at all levels: above the knee, below the knee, or on an angle. Skirts also favour slits – up the front, the back or at the side.

Tops are being tucked into skirts and pants, or are long to cover the hips. Pants and jeans, for both sexes, include cropped or stove pipe style, with rolled-up cuffs, as well as leisure pants with patch pockets at thigh level or lower, fastened with zippers or buttons.

A highlight of the show was the evening wear scene. The girls donned flowing pastel gowns from Nevik; the boys sported Waxmans tuxedos, white jackets and frilled shirts. Ballerina Robyn Szwarcok joined them, complete in tutu, dancing to Andrea Bocelli's Time to Say Goodbye. It was quite a contrast to the rest of the highly animated show, displaying the versatility of the young talent.

Volunteers Jason Ansel, Lisa Mailhot, Nicole Amiel, Natalie Kakon and Alecs Kakon created the scenes, with assistance from professional choreographers Mikki Nishida, Mabel Palomino and Marvin Baptiste.

The theatrical makeup, which included rhinestone and crystal decorated cheeks, was done by Corrine Cosmetics. Evolove provided the extension braided coifs, while Le Pascha tweaked the guys' locks.

"The show and the clothes are secondary to the reason these kids are doing this," said ICRF supporter Allen Rubin. "It's the cause – cancer research."

"The kids chose the title Honesty of the Innocence in tribute to the thousands of children who suffer from Hodgkin's disease," said Lianne Vineberg, one of the adult volunteers.

ICRF, founded in 1975, is a coalition of physicians, scientists and lay leaders dedicated to finding a cure for cancer by raising funds for research in Israel, Toronto and Montreal.

Discreet talks held with PA

By AMOS HAREL
Ha'aretz daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — Contacts between senior Israeli and Palestinian officials have been widely in evidence in the 10 days since Prime Minister Ariel Sharon took office.

The latest such contact, a meeting between Shin Bet security service head Avi Dichter and Palestinian intelligence chief Amin al-Hindi, took place late Saturday night at Erez junction on the Gaza Strip border, Israeli officials confirmed.

Saturday's meeting between Dichter and al-Hindi did not produce clear, tangible results, Israeli officials admit. The main point of contention at this and other meetings concerns Israel's request that the PA actively undertake to arrest persons suspected of involvement in terror strikes. The Palestinians refuse to make such a formal commitment; they first want Israel to lift the closures imposed in the territories.

Other meetings between Israeli and PA officials have been held away from the media spotlight. "All told, there have been a lot of contacts behind the scenes," one well-placed Israeli security official confirms.

Dialogue between Israel and the Palestinian Authority has been pursued in three different arenas:

• Unofficial political diplomatic talks: Yossi Ginosar has unofficially represented Israel in discussions held in PA Chairman Yasser Arafat's office; and the prime minister's son, Omri Sharon, has spoken with Arafat's economic adviser Muhammad Rashid.

• Top level security talks: Saturday's meeting between Dichter and al-Hindi could be the forerunner of a series of talks between top IDF officers and Shin Bet officials and leading figures from the PA's security apparatus. In such meetings, Israel tries to keep away from senior PA officials it believes have condoned or actively conspired in terror attacks.

• Liaison contacts in the field: IDF officers and civil administration officials maintain contacts with PA counterparts in such frameworks as the District Coordination Office in Gaza. The character and level of such contacts varies from region to region.

The security source stressed that these top and middle-level contacts do not constitute a full-scale renewal of security co-ordination. "They are just preliminary discussions," the source stressed.

Technion students design micro spy plane

Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

HAIFA — Fourth-year aeronautics department students at the Technion, in cooperation with Rafael, the armaments development authority, successfully tested a tiny unmanned aerial vehicle (UAV) last week. The 310-gram aircraft carried an 18-gram video camera onboard.

The micro-UAV is designed to gather intelligence in urban areas, where radar cannot be used, or with military units, over hills. It is radio-controlled and very difficult to see from the ground because it is so small – its wingspan is a mere 60 centimetres.

The student-built UAV incorporates technologies readily available. Its most expensive component is its video camera, which cost about $800 and was loaned to the students by Rafael.

But that costly camera was also the only component that failed last week's test flight.

The decision to embark on the joint project was taken after the Pentagon expressed interest in a micro-UAV. The micro-UAV is meant to carry tiny surveilance equipment over preset flight circuits without being seen.

Responding to Zaid's announcement about the 13 afflicted animals, Jordan declared Sunday that it is banning the import of meat from the PA. Jordan's Agriculture Ministry has announced that it is launching an immunization campaign against the disease, and that thus far there is no evidence of a foot and mouth outbreak in the Hashemite Kingdom.

Last week Israel announced it would transfer 150,000 vaccinations against foot-and-mouth disease to the PA. Israel will also provide the Palestinians with the means to diagnose the highly contagious disease, which afflicts mainly cattle, sheep and pigs and is currently threatening Europe's animal stocks.

A meeting was set up between Agriculture Minister Shalom Simhon and his Palestinian counterpart, Hikmat Zeid, in Beit Dagan where the Israeli minister was to offer the Palestinians veterinary assistance in combating the disease. The meeting, initiated by Zeid, will be the first between an Israeli minister and his Palestinian opposite number since the outbreak of the intifadah late last September.

Foot and mouth disease has already swept Britain and landed in Europe, forcing the destruction of tens of thousands of sheep, cattle and pigs. It shows no signs of containment, and fears of its contagion have spurred the United States, Canada and Japan to ban the import of all EU raw meat and livestock.

The virus is easily transmitted from animal to animal, and can also be carried on clothing and car tires, in animal feeds and by the wind.

Maj.-Gen. Yaakov Or, co-ordinator of government activities in the West Bank and the Gaza Strip, promised the head of veterinary services at the Agriculture Ministry, Dr. Oded Nir, that the Israel Defence Forces (IDF) will assist in the transfer of the medical aid to the PA areas, even those parts still under IDF closure.

Agriculture Ministry experts say outbreaks of foot and mouth are common in areas under PA auspices, and that its endemic nature there is the source of most outbreaks of the disease among Israeli herds. They stress that the disease could not reach epidemic proportions in Israel, because all cows and sheep here are immunized against it.

Israel spends about $1 million every year to vaccinate cattle, sheep, goats and pigs for three different varients of the foot and mouth virus. It also takes every precaution to make sure that the barn door is not open to another potential hazard - contaminated meal for cattle and sheep, which is thought to be the cause of the present outbreak in Great Britain.

Katsav urges minister to halt Mount plunder

By NADAV SHRAGAI
Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — President Moshe Katsav has asked Public Security Minister Uzi Landau to take action to stop the destruction of antiquities on the Temple Mount.

Katsav's appeal followed his meeting last week with members of the Committee to Prevent the Destruction of Antiquities on the Temple Mount.

Katsav told Landau he had the impression that in recent years, and especially now, the Wakf Muslim religious trust is taking unilateral steps that the Israeli authorities cannot prevent, steps which are leading to the loss of historical knowledge and archeological remains from the holiest site of the Jewish people.

Katsav and Landau discussed the possibility of permanent closure of the Temple Mount gate, through which Wakf trucks and bulldozers are driven into the area, and through which the Wakf has on more than one occasion hauled away uncounted truckloads of dirt and precious artifacts.

Landau told the president that he was still studying all the issues relating to the Temple Mount, and made no promises. He did, however, tell Katsav that he is also very concerned about the Wakf's activities on the Temple Mount that are not coordinated with Israel.

He agreed on the need to work toward resuming the supervision of the site by the Israeli Antiquities Authority, whose role on the Mount has been reduced to near-zero since the tunnel riots in 1996.

Last week, Landau toured east Jerusalem and received explanations from senior Jerusalem police officials on the actions being taken on the Temple Mount. Ha'aretz has learned that the Shin Bet security services have asked Prime Minister Ariel Sharon once again to immediately allow non-Muslims to enter the Temple Mount.

The site has been closed to non-Muslims since the riots that began the latest intifadah last fall.

Force 17 boss said head of terror gang

By AMOS HAREL
Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — Mahmoud Demara, the Ramallah commander of Yasser Arafat's presidential guard, Force 17, is also the head of a terrorist gang that has killed eight Israelis and wounded about 20 over the past five months, the Shin Bet security service said last week.

Demara's role in the gang emerged from an interrogation of three members who were arrested in Kalandiyah earlier in the week.

The three said they had planned to detonate a bomb in Jerusalem's Neve Ya'akov neighbourhood, near the headquarters of the IDF's Central Command, and then plant other bombs in gas stations and clubs around Jerusalem, security services sources said.

Details of the investigation released by the Shin Bet yesterday indicate the "hard core" of the group, comprising some 25 members, comes from Force 17. Demara, as its leader, is the one who chose the group's targets, planned the attacks and supplied gang members with weapons from Force 17's arsenal.

Shin Bet officials said they are also investigating the group's ties to Marwan Barghouti, one of the leaders of Arafat's Fatah faction on the West Bank, and the heads of Force 17 and the Palestinian intelligence service. The heads of the Palestinian security services appear to have known about the gang's activities, the Shin Bet officials said, but made no effort to prevent its attacks on Israel.

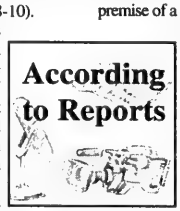
"There are reasonable indications that some of the heads of the [PA security] services were aware of this activity, even in the initial stages of [the gang's] formation," one Shin Bet official said.

The three were identified as Mahmoud Matar, 20; Ziad Wahadan, 25; and Youssef Matir, 22. Wahadan is one of the leaders of the Fatah in Kalandiyah.

Despite the arrests, several members of the gang, including Demara, were still at large in Palestinian-controlled territory. Most are believed to be in Ramallah – which was the reason for the closure of the city imposed earlier this week by the IDF.

Though the bulk of the group is from Force 17, it also includes members of Hamas and Nayaf Hawatmeh's Democratic Front for the Liberation of Palestine. Its activities covered a large portion of the West Bank: the areas around Jerusalem, Ramallah, Nablus and Jenin. In total, the gang has carried out some 25 shooting attacks over the past five months, and has now begun preparing bombs.

Disinfectant, or just distasteful?



Do the media report the news or do they make it? When does an item become newsworthy? These perennial questions were thrown into relief by a three-part series by Stephanie Nolen which appeared recently in the Globe and Mail (March 8-10).

The series was about one item that may appear on the agenda at a UN conference against racism scheduled for late summer in Durban, South Africa.

The news wasn't the conference itself, but rather the attempts by Arab and Muslim states – foremost Iran – to reintroduce the "Zionism is racism" canard and impose it on the Durban conference, thereby derailing it from its original objective of investigating the effects of colonialism and the slave-trade.

Headlined "Zionism-as-racism furor threatens to engulf UN," the Globe gave the story front-page attention on March 8. It followed up with additional reports the next two days. Interestingly, no major U.S. newspaper appears to have covered the story at all. The Durban conference has remained a Canadian news phenomenon, perhaps driven by Nolen's initiative. Items and editorials have since appeared in numerous Canadian papers, including The CJN. With the exception of Nolen, all have focused on the broader anti-racism agenda originally proposed for Durban with some mention of the "Zionism is racism" issue.

It may be argued that as an investigative reporter, Nolen has displayed good journalism by bringing an important and overlooked item to light. "The basic premise of a scoop is that you're bringing important facts to public attention," wrote Michael Kinsley in Time a couple of years ago. "Your philosophical touchstone is former U.S. Supreme Court Justice Louis Brandeis' bromide that sunlight is the best disinfectant."

The downside is that by casting too much sunlight on a previously, completely discredited, slander – namely, that the national liberation movement of the Jewish people, alone among all liberation movements, is racist – a platform is again provided for those whose sole interest is promoting a racist calumny.

On balance, this danger has been met by copious denunciations from both Jewish and non-Jewish authorities, including former U.S. senator Daniel Patrick Moynihan. Also to be considered is whether the "disinfectant" benefit that Nolen provides will succeed in alerting those, including NGOs, who need to fight any vile attempt to revive this malicious defamation.

Sharon ready to move Gaza settlers

Sharon aims to grant the Palestinians extensive economic benefits, and to be very flexible on the issue of water allocations. Yet his aides have told Sharon that such benefits are not enough to bring Arafat to accept an interim agreement.

A key element in the Sharon plan is to give the Palestinians in Gaza as much territorial contiguity as possible. To do so would mean more than bypass roads and tunnels near Israeli settlements. It is clear that some settlements would have to be evacuated if Israel sincerely intends to provide territorial contiguity.

There is readiness to make territorial concessions if Arafat is ready to move to a series of interim agreements over the coming years.

Gaza's settlements disrupt the territorial contiguity of the Strip for the Palestinians. Gush Katif is in the south, while in the north, not far from the Israeli border, are the settlements of Dugit, Nisanit and El Sinai. In the centre of the strip is Nitzanim and Kfar Darom, two isolated settlements. And south of Khan Yunis, opposite Gush Katif, is another isolated settlement, Morag.

The Israel Defence Forces has successfully protected these settlements, but at a very high cost. Sharon's readiness to give up some of them will depend on the precondition that the violence stops and that it does not appear as if Israel's departure was a result of pressure.

During the cabinet meeting Sunday, Sharon said that from what he had heard so far from American sources, the United States agrees with Israel that there cannot be any negotiations until the PA takes steps to end the violence.

He told the ministers that in his absence, Foreign Minister Shimon Peres would be acting prime minister, with the authority to call cabinet sessions.

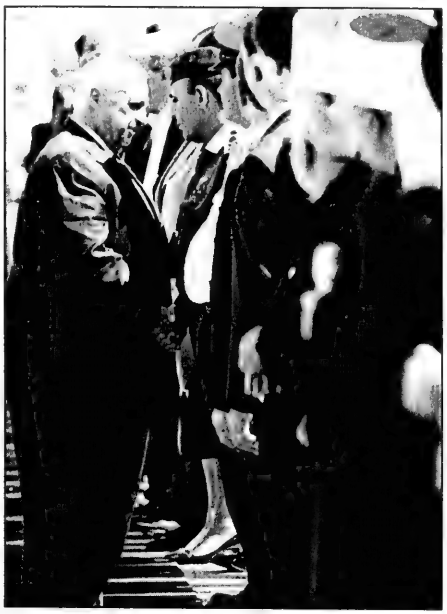
Sharon praised Peres highly for his appearance at the UN Security Council, which discussed sending observer troops to the Palestinian territories. Peres reported that he made clear to the council that the Sharon government had made peace its central mission, and that the main obstacle to accomplishing that goal was "more emotional than territorial."

He said that Israel was astonished when the Palestinians rejected former prime minister Ehud Barak's unprecedented offers to them, and were baffled by the "inexplicable" Palestinian violence that broke out after the Camp David summit.

Sharon told the ministers that he had no objection to them meeting with their Palestinian counterparts, but warned against conducting any negotiations with them. He said they could meet socially, but not on matters regarding their ministries.

Meanwhile, in related developments, even as Sharon was on his way to Washington, an Israeli was killed on the road between Jerusalem and Gush Etzion by a Palestinian sniper.

An Israeli soldier was also lightly injured Sunday by fragments of a mortar shell fired at an army base near Kibbutz Nahal Oz, adjacent to the Gaza Strip. It was the first time that the Palestinians had fired shells into Israel proper from Gaza.



Israeli Prime Minister Ariel Sharon received a dignitary's farewell at Ben Gurion Airport Sunday before his departure for Washington. [Israel photo]

British media accused of anti-Israel bias

By RICHARD ALLEN GREENE
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

LONDON — As clashes between Israel and the Palestinians continue for the sixth month, some Jews in the United Kingdom are concerned that Israel is not getting a fair hearing in the British press.

The Guardian newspaper has been the subject of the harshest criticism, but another daily newspaper, the Independent, as well as the BBC have also caused concern.

Canadian publishing magnate Conrad Black launched a wide-ranging attack against "large sections of the British media" for being "rabidly anti-Israel," publicly attacking one of his own columnists for expressing a hatred for Israel that he described as "irrational and an offence to civilized taste."

Black, owner of the Jerusalem Post and the Daily Telegraph, wrote an article attacking a columnist at his own Spectator magazine for anti-Israel bias, widening his criticism to include "most of the relevant sections of the BBC, Independent, Guardian, Evening Standard and the Foreign and Commonwealth Office," Britain's equivalent of the U.S. State Department.

There are people in the British Jewish community who share Black's concerns.

"Israel is portrayed as a brutal regime interested only in hurting Palestinians," said Hagai Segal of the World Zionist Organization.

The British press sees "Israel as a superpower and the Palestinians as poor people who want peace, and neither perspective is remotely accurate," Segal told the JTA.

Part of the problem, he said, is that the British press in general tends to side with underdogs.

D.J. Schneeweis, the Israeli press attaché in London, agreed.

"There is a tendency in many quarters of the media to go softly on the perceived weaker side in any conflict – in this case, the Palestinians," he said.

"The presumption is that if more Palestinians than Israelis are being killed, it must be the Israelis using force."

Yet emphasizing the number of fatalities – without saying which side is initiating the attacks – leads to bias in articles, Schneeweis said.

Segal said the problem has gotten worse since the intifadah broke out in September.

After the Oslo peace process began in 1993, "there was more neutral, balanced, non-emotive reporting…But now it's like the 1980s again," when the press was strongly critical of Israeli tactics in the original Palestinian uprising, he said.

The paper that has been most strongly condemned is the Guardian, a left-leaning London daily. Last month, it was the target of an e-mail campaign begun by a group called Honest Reporting.com.

Started by a couple of young Londoners last October to monitor what they saw as anti-Israel bias in the press, Honest Reporting was soon taken over by Media Watch International, a new group based in New York.

When the Guardian reported that a man who killed eight Israelis by plowing his bus into a group of soldiers and civilians in mid-February was seen "in the Gaza Strip as a sort of Palestinian Everyman who finally snapped," Honest Reporting encouraged its 12,000 e-mail subscribers to write to the paper to complain.

"It places no blame whatsoever on the Palestinians. In article after article, and editorial after editorial, the Guardian places sole blame on Israel, on Israel's new prime minister, or on the Israel Defence Force," the monitoring group charged.

Four days after the Honest Reporting petition went out, the Guardian's comment editor, David Leigh, wrote an article saying that hundreds of e-mails had come in from around the world about the bus driver article.

Leigh traced the campaign back to Honest Reporting and Media Watch International. He linked both groups to the Orthodox group Aish HaTorah, which he described as "widely regarded as right-wing extremists, not people entitled to harass the media into what they would call 'objectivity.'"

Sharon Tzur, the director of Media Watch International, said some people associated with her group are also associated with Aish, but there are no institutional links between the organizations.

She also said she was disappointed that Leigh responded with an attack on the messenger rather than addressing the substance of the group's complaint.

Leigh did not respond to JTA inquiries. Under Guardian policy, individual journalists are not permitted to speak to the media about the newspaper. But the Guardian's editor, Alan Rusbridger, told JTA he found the complaints baseless.

He said that the Guardian has published pieces by Israeli Foreign Minister Shimon Peres and writers Amos Oz and David Grossman – leading leftists who have been highly critical of Israeli policy – as well as local Jewish columnists, including Linda Grant, Jonathan Freedlander and Ned Temko, the editor of the Jewish Chronicle.

"We are very careful to make sure Jewish and Israeli voices are heard," he said.

Some British Jews feel the Guardian is particularly problematic when it comes to Middle East reporting.

"Most press bias is accidental, through naivete, not design," said Segal. "The exception is the Guardian, which sends biased reporters who make biased reports."

CounterSpin host in his element

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Avi Lewis of CBC Newsworld's CounterSpin compares himself to a perpetual student.

"It's a lot like school, but the course never ends," said the genial host/producer of the nationally televised debate show, broadcast Monday to Thursday at 8 p.m.

"It feels like I'm paid to learn – and argue – about every topic under the sun," he added. "I've always been a news junkie, but now I've taken it beyond addiction."

Lewis, 33, is truly in his element on CounterSpin, which debuted in the autumn of 1998.

After introducing the show's topic at hand in a brief, punchy essay, he debates the issue with a group of invited panellists. They may discuss the Middle East, China, cloning or whatever subject is topical that week. Then the audience joins the fray.

Lewis directs the verbal fireworks with a light touch. The debates make for intelligent and engaged television.

By conventional standards, Lewis an unusual host. Eschewing a suit and tie, he wears a casual jersey and jacket, with one silver earring in each ear. "We've cultivated an informal atmosphere, and it works," he said the other afternoon.

Lewis acknowledged that his attire was a source of anxiety at the outset. But once his producers agreed that CounterSpin exuded credibility and passion, the matter was never raised again.

CounterSpin, he believes, occupies an important niche because the lifeblood of a vibrant democracy is fervent debate.

"There's a feeling among Canadians that that's not happening in parliament. Most of our political culture is about avoiding debate. I'm proud that CounterSpin has created a significant political space."

A graduate of the University of Toronto in philosophy and English literature, Lewis is hardly new to politics.

His father, Stephen, a United Nations consultant, led the NDP in Ontario and was Canada's ambassador to the UN. His mother, Michele Landsberg, is a columnist at The Toronto Star. David, his late grandfather, was for years national leader of the NDP.

As anyone watching CounterSpin can readily ascertain, Lewis has inherited his family's left-of-centre beliefs and outlook.

"There is a long tradition of democratic socialism in my family," explained Lewis, who connects with Judaism on a cultural plane and considers himself a peacenik in terms of Israeli politics. "I grew up in that line." As did his two sisters, Ilana, 35, a UN employee in New York City, and Jenny, 30, a Toronto TV, movie and theatre casting agent.

Lewis' wife, the writer and author Naomi Klein (No Logo), is also a leftist. He met her in 1993 when he was covering politics for CityTV. They were married in 1997.

Lewis, who says he was raised as a feminist, was never much interested in becoming a media personality until he fell off a mountain in the Himalayas and injured his leg. As he recuperated at home, learning to walk again, he had a reawakening. He would not be a musician or a rock star, as he had dreamed of. "I wanted something connected with the world."

In 1990, he became a news writer, then a reporter, on City TV's City Pulse at Six. Subsequently, he was host of The New Music and Too Much For Much on City TV and MuchMusic.

On these cutting-edge programs, he interviewed celebrities such as Leonard Cohen, Elvis Costello and The Rolling Stones, and discussed the latest developments and fads in youth culture.

Of CounterSpin, Lewis says he finds that the best shows are those where the conversation flows feely and guests forget they are on camera.

A musical treat for the little ones

BY JOYCE SINGER-D'APRILE
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — Uncle Jeb's Farm, an original children's musical, is currently playing at The Tranzac Club.

A universal fable that teaches young children the importance of nature, friendship and working together to reach common goals, the play is about the adventures of a ladybug named Tica (Daniela Carnevale) who is guided by Mother Earth (Kesta Graham).

Standout characters in the story are an arrogant prize horse (David Doucette), a beautiful bird who is the last of her species (Sarah Podemski), and goofy Uncle Jeb himself (Joshua Engel).

On opening night, I recruited Daniel, my nine-year-old nephew, to be my co-critic. Although he found the story enjoyable, Daniel was convinced that it was geared towards kids at least a couple of years younger – before they become enamoured with high-speed video games and Arnold Schwarzenegger flicks.

Overall, I tend to agree with my pint-sized associate. We also both felt the musical numbers would be much improved if they were shorter and livelier. Nevetheless, the littlest ones in the audience were entirely caught up in the story, calling out "helpfully" to the characters onstage, which totally charmed the rest of us.

There's a bit of interaction when the actors descend from the stage to mingle with the audience, which is always exciting for the children.

Uncle Jeb's Farm is the second in a trilogy. The first musical, Starshine, was presented at the Poor Alex Theatre, for one week in 1999.

The creative team at Starshine Productions bonded a few years ago.

"We've all known each other since we were campers, and then counsellors, at Camp Shomria, a summer sleepover camp for children from Ontario, New York, and Michigan," producer/ director Dori Skye, 26, says." We've travelled together to Costa Rica and lived in a kibbutz together in Israel."

The team includes playwright Avishai Adiv, composer Paul Kates, set and costume designer Melanie Levine and musical director Joshua Engel.

This show is a great way to spend quality time with the kids. If they are fans of Teletubbies and Blues Clues, then Uncle Jeb's Farm is for them.

Uncle Jeb's Farm: The Tranzac Club, 292 Brunswick Ave. (through March 25). 416-537-7469. Tickets: $15.00 adults/$10.00 children.

Family Album a compelling Holocaust film

By RON CSILLAG
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Toronto screenwriter/producer Tony Sheer has created a compelling, if somewhat clichéd, tale of how the Holocaust's terrible times still have the power to wound – and to heal.

Family Album, which airs this Sunday (March 25) at 11:30 p.m. on CBC Television's Canadian Reflections series, ties everything up in a neat, 24-minute package. Ruby Black ("reinvented," she says, from Schwartz) is a streetwise, 20-year-old photographer who rescues a beat-up violin from the trash of a recently-deceased old recluse. At the same time, her estranged grandfather Ben, an Auschwitz survivor, shows up after 10 years to try and heal the rift between them.

It turns out Ben and his son – Ruby's father – were less than ideal role models, something they blamed on the trauma wrought by Ben's war-time experiences, which included cleaning out corpses from the gas chambers. "You projected all your pain onto him," Ruby complains to Ben of her father. She, in turn, was toughened by it all.

Now Ben wants to make amends, but a cynical Ruby pushes him away, wondering where he was when she needed him. Enter the violin.

Restored by Ruby's musician boyfriend, who coaxes a war-time ditty from it, the instrument seems to take on a life of its own. For Ruby has also found an aged photograph of its owner and his wife, to whom Ruby bears an uncanny resemblance (newcomer Leanna Barnes plays both parts). Now, the young woman is haunted by nightmares of Holocaust-era images, of yellow Star of David badges, of frightened Jews scurrying away from ominous sounds in a bleak, black-and-white world. She begins to soften.

Ben (well played by opera headliner Emile Belcourt) spies the old photo and recognizes the violin's owner as an old friend and fellow survivor. The instrument now serves as a bridge between him and his granddaughter, who start a dialogue, of sorts, but in a highly stilted way. "You don't want to talk," says Ben. "You just want to pick at my scabs." Counters Ruby: "You don't know how to love. You pass it along like a curse." Who talks this way? Actors with lines.

In any event, the violin serves as more than a source of music. It is the instrument by which a measure of closure is achieved between Ruby and Ben. She begins to accept her heritage and her grandfather for what he is: bent but not broken.

Sheer, who has written three other Holocaust-related projects, says it took him three years to raise the money for Family Album. "I've never had so many doors slam in my face," he says. While the most frustrating project of his career, it was also the most rewarding, for in the end, the script opened doors. Key locations were offered for free, suppliers loaned state-of-the-art equipment at deep discounts, and expensive film crew members worked for less – all because people wanted to be a part of the work.

Sheer's persistence has paid off. Family Album is, in the end, satisfying. It's been adopted as part of the Holocaust education curriculum in Ontario high schools and will also be used as a resource by educators and health care professionals across Canada.

ONCE IN A WHILE a Broadway revival comes along that is so inventive, so galvanic, that theatergoers feel they are experiencing something entirely new – it is a production that conclusively demonstrates that Broadway musicals can be treated like Shakespeare and other classic texts, that in the hands of a gifted director they can be repeatedly reimagined and made to yield new truths.

Girona rich in Jewish history

By MYRIAM SHECHTER
Special to The CJN

GIRONA, Spain — I am not sure what got me most excited about Girona: the medieval quarter, redolent with mystical history; the picturesque narrow streets where dark old buildings are revived by tubs filled with bright flowers; the lively Rambla de la Libertat with its cafés, restaurants and buskers; the flower market carpeting the street with an explosion of colour; the river Onyar quietly carrying the reflection of rainbow-hued medieval houses; the old bridge with its vendors tempting passersby with exotic perfumes and sparkling jewellery; the sweetness of xuixo (pronounced "chucho"), an irresistible, local concoction of pastry and cream; the single-towered cathedral looking down on the town from the top of its 90-stepped-entrance.

Girona, pronounced hee-RO-na in Spanish and zhee-RO-na in Catalan, is the capital of the province with the same name which covers the area between the province of Barcelona to the south and the French border to the north, and which boasts beautiful scenery, from the Pyrenees mountains to the Mediterranean beaches of Costa Brava.

Rich in Gothic and Romanesque architecture, Girona is home to numerous historical sites, museums and well-preserved, picturesque medieval streets.

As in most towns in Spain, Girona's Jewish Quarter, the Call, has become one of the major tourist attractions. The Call – the name is derived from the Latin callum (street) – extends from the area next to the Girona Cathedral, with the Carrer de la Força as its main thoroughfare, to a number of steep narrow streets branching out on a hill.

Although the layout of the streets and alleys of the Jewish Quarter is not exactly as it was in medieval times, the picturesque buildings evoke images of that bygone era, when a community of about one thousand Jews lived and prospered in the old stone houses of this Catalan town.

For the more inquisitive visitor, there are various paths which lead to the interior of the Call, such as Carrero de Sant Llorenç or the extremely steep and narrow Escalinata del Quatre Cantons – a whole quarter of passages and cul-de-sacs which was once a bustling hive of everyday life, trade and study.

Although Jews have inhabited Girona since Roman times, they started making their mark as a community around the year 980, with life centred around the synagogue. Like in all towns in Spain at the time, the Jewish community – or Aljama – was autonomous under the direct authority of the king.

After a peaceful 200 years, there were periodic attacks against the community; in case of serious danger, the Jews were moved to the Gironella tower, a hilltop fortified castle, until things calmed down. Eventually the Call became a ghetto: a single gate allowed access in and out, and all windows and doors opening on the Carrer de la Força were sealed.

In spite of all these difficulties, the Jewish community of Girona succeeded in projecting its skills and knowledge far beyond the ghetto's and the town's limits. From the dark streets of the Call sprang a philosophy that illuminated Jewish thought for centuries to come: the city is renowned as the home of famous kabbalists Jonah ben Abraham, David Kimhi, Isaac Halevi, Azriel de Girona, Messulam de Piera, and especially Moshe ben Nahman, also known as Nahmanides, Ramban, or by his Catalan name, Bonastruc ça Porta.

Born in Girona in 1194, Nahmanides was a physician, a philosopher and a Talmudist. As Rabbi of Girona, and later Chief Rabbi of Catalunya, he took an active part in the Barcelona Disputation of 1263, where he had the upper hand over the Dominican Pau Cristian.

At the bottom of Carrero de Sant Llorenç, just off Carrer de la Força, a plaque recalls his distinguished presence in Girona. Walk up the stone steps of this medieval stone enclosed street and, on your right, a red plaque announces, "Centre Bonastruc ça Porta."

Named after Jewish Girona's most illustrious figure, the Centre is a warren of rooms and stairways covered by climbing vines, surrounding a sunny courtyard with a large Magen David embedded in the pavement.

The Centre covers an area where the synagogue used to be, as well as a butcher shop, a mikvah and a few Jewish houses. (Items recovered from these homes can be viewed at Girona's Archeological Museum.) The Centre features a reconstruction of medieval Jewish homes and a number of stone tablets, and it includes the Catalan Museum of Jewish Culture and the Nahmanides Institute of Studies, where international scholars come to study the legacy of the Ramban.

Since the 1492 expulsion, there have been no Jews living in Girona. However, an unexpected phenomenon is currently taking place here, says Lidia Donat, a librarian at the Centre. "People [are] try[ing] to find some Jewish ancestry," she says. It is now fashionable to be a descendant of a Jewish or Converso family; last names are being scrutinized for connection to old Jewish names.

For more information, visit the Tourist Office of Spain, 2 Bloor St. West, 34th floor, Toronto, Ont., M4W 3E2; call 416-961-3131; or fax 416-961-1992. In Spain, visit the Centre Bonastruc ça Porta: c/Sant Llorenç, s/n, P.O. Box 450, 17080 Girona, or call 34-72-216761. On the Internet, www.tourspain.es, or email callgirona@grn.es.

Personal trainers tailor home exercise programs

By CYNTHIA GASNER
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — Personal trainers offer one-on-one services to help create an individualized home exercise program that will keep you fit and can be extended to outdoor activities when the weather turns warm.

These specialized programs are designed in the comfort and security of your own home by trainers such as Christine Pineau-Burke and Beverley D. Burdeyney. The activities may include weight management, cardiovascular training, strength and flexibility training or sports-related exercises.

After an initial consultation, says Pineau-Burke of Body'n Soul In Home Fitness Training, she devotes a great deal of attention to technique. She says education in how to do the exercises is imperative.

Beverley Burdeyney

"We therefore insist on gradual progression of an individual's program depending on the client's current fitness level, personal well-being, and how well he or she acquires new skills," Pineau-Burke says. "Ongoing evaluations of performance and progress are documented."

"It is particularly important to strengthen your body prior to resuming demanding physical activities such as hiking, tennis or golf," says Burdeyney, a personal exercise coach and fitness writer.

"For example, to guarantee better performance when the golf season opens, it is never too early to condition and strengthen your body. Doing so will lead to a more fulfilling game."

Ten minutes a day of exercise can help prevent or eliminate house fatigue and boredom and get you fit, Burdeyney says.

Pineau-Burke says her goal is to create a positive attitude by motivating and exciting individuals "to learn the scientific and clearly effective way to health and well-being."

Along with regular exercise programs, personal trainers design and implement rehabilitation programs for individuals suffering from fibromyalgia, arthritis, hypertension, motor vehicle injuries, back and athletic injuries.

"I work closely with health-care practitioners as part of the rehabilitation team," Pineau-Burke says. "I offer programs to individuals who are unable to travel to physiotherapy and for those who are ready for active therapy."

Burdeyney, a senior who has spina bifida, a congenital defect of the spine, says it is possible to undertake a safe, effective exercise program without going to a gym or using heavy equipment.

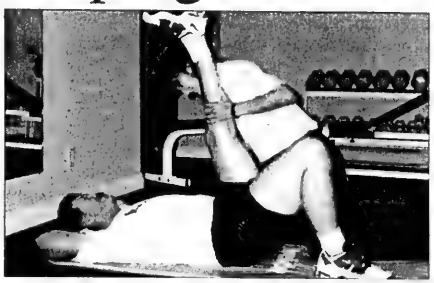
Her motto is "structure governs function," and she says her first objective is to "help clients create their own dynamic central stability girdle" made up of the pelvic abdomen and lower back.

Some basic stretch exercises she recommends are the pelvic tilt, single and double knees to the chest, head and neck stretch, and upper torso stretch.

She compares this area of the body to the foundation of a house. "If the foundation is strong and solid, then the building will be stable and stand erect. The same is true for your body."

Burdeyney recommends 10 basic exercises that do not require heavy equipment. "Elastic exercise bands, light weights and exercise balls are portable and can be used easily," and there are many chair and floor exercises that are particularly effective for those in rehabilitation programs, she says.

"Exercise helps you look and feel your best and allows you to achieve and maintain a healthier and more productive lifestyle. Fitness is a state of mind that affects your entire body. My motto is eat less and exercise more," Burdeyney says.



Christine Pineau-Burke with a client.

She stresses the need for a personal assessment, as each person has different needs and it is important to do exercises properly to avoid injuries.

"Before you begin any exercise program, it is important to have an assessment by a doctor or fitness professional."

It is also important to de-stress your body after exercising by lying flat on your back with your buttock close to a chair. Place your legs on the chair by bending your knees to have the calves rest on the chair seat. Knees should fall directly over hip bones. Place a small pillow below neck/head for extra support.

Burdeyney recommends that this should also be done if you are feeling stressed or experiencing back pain. In addition, deep-breathing exercises while thinking pleasant thoughts are beneficial.

Orthodox hoopster skips big game for Shabbat

By PETER EPHROSS
Special to The CJN

NEWARK, Del. — Add Tamir Goodman's name to the small pantheon of Jewish athletes who have been faced with the choice of competing or sitting out a game for religious reasons.

Like baseball star Sandy Koufax – who refused to pitch in the first game of the 1965 World Series because it fell on Yom Kippur – Goodman recently refused to compete in a post-season tournament game because it conflicted with a more frequent Jewish holy day, Shabbat.

Goodman, who plays basketball for Towson University, skipped the first game and a half at a qualifying event, as his Baltimore school competed in the America East tournament for a berth in the larger NCAA tourney.

To those who know the Goodman story, it didn't come as a surprise.

An Orthodox Jew who wears his yarmulke on the court, Goodman first made headlines a couple of years ago, when the University of Maryland, where Goodman seemed likely to play, said it would try to avoid scheduling games on Shabbat during his tenure with the team.

The subject of a profile in Sports Illustrated magazine, Goodman – dubbed "the Jewish Jordan" – became a media darling.

After Goodman injured his knee, however, Maryland appeared to back away from its scholarship commitment, and the team and the player parted company.

Playing in the less-prestigious America East conference with Towson Tigers, Goodman suffered some growing pains this year. He averaged only six points and four assists per game as his team struggled to a record of 11-16 and finished seventh in the league during the regular season.

But as the season progressed, Goodman worked his way into the team's starting lineup as point guard.

Goodman has "court vision, a feel for the game and the ability to make everyone better," Towson coach Mike Jaskulski said.

Without the six-foot-three, 155-pound Goodman, Towson barely squeaked by in its first-round tournament game against Hartford, winning 65-62.

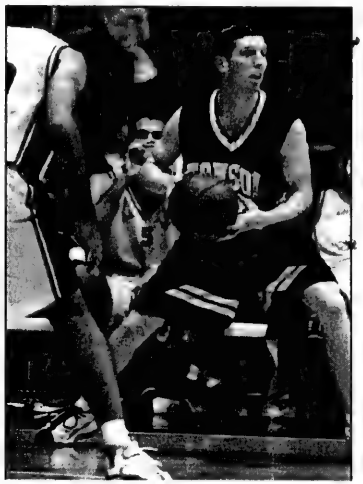
That set up a match Saturday evening against heavily favoured Delaware. The conference refused to switch the game to a later time slot because it would have forced Delaware, the No. 2 seed, to play with less rest Sunday if it defeated Towson.

The Tigers struggled, falling behind by 15 at the half. Arriving at halftime after Shabbat had ended, the gangly Goodman quickly gave the team a spark, hitting a three-point shot and providing a perfect pass that led to a slam dunk – all to the sound of "oohs" and "aahs" from the crowd.

But there were no miracles. Towson fell, 66-51.

If the team's record wasn't up to par, the Goodman experiment apparently was.

Other than the tournament, Towson played no games between sundown Friday and Saturday, and Goodman was excused from Saturday afternoon practices.



Tamir Goodman

Once, when the team was on the road and sundown was approaching, Goodman left the team van and walked three blocks to a house where he was staying for Shabbat.

"They see me fasting on some days, and they learn about Havdalah and kosher food," Goodman says.

"It's a great opportunity to teach them about Judaism."

Jaskulski, who now keeps a Jewish calendar on his wall, agrees.

"As the guys see Tamir practise religion, their respect for him grows," Jaskulski says.

Aspirals' home girls win clutch of medals

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — The Ontario championships in rhythmic gymnastics are only weeks away, and Sophie Berg, Zoe Cappe and Julia Gurau are gearing up for the event.

Although the three young athletes are not shoo-ins to qualify for the provincial meet, they have legitimate chances to participate – and even come away with medals, if their performances at a recent invitational tournament are any indication.

Berg won a gold medal, Gurau silver and Cappe bronze at the Valentine Classic, an event sponsored by the Toronto Aspirals Rhythmic Gymnastics Centre, their home club.

Berg, 13, was very excited with her result, though she admits to experiencing a little trepidation going in. "I was fourth to perform, so I was really nervous," she said.

Despite her butterflies, Berg responded to the pressure and came through in the clutch to capture a well deserved gold medal.

All the Aspirals girls performed well, said Sima Studin, general manager and president of the club. The "senior girls," who range in age from 12 to 13, did particularly well.

Competing with five apparatuses – ball, hoop, ribbon, rope and clubs – the girls showed championship mettle. Their dedication and hard work showed through, but much of their success can also be traced back to the demands placed on the girls by their international-calibre coach, Angelica Ternovsky, Studin said.

Aspirals girls "look very polished, very into it, really liking what they're doing," Studin said. "Angelica demands it from the girls and she gives all her energy to them."

The girls gave plenty of their own energy in preparing for the meet. They train four times a week, three hours at a time – three times a week at Forest Hill Public School and on weekends at the Bathurst Jewish Community Centre(BJCC).

Hard work is part of the story, but God-given gifts are also important ingredients. Top competitors must show flexibility and balance, and be blessed with the right kind of body type, Studin said. Slim, long-legged girls with good body line do best, though average girls can also do well. All top performers must work hard, be dedicated to the sport and have good family supports behind them, she added.

Sophie Berg

Competitiveness is another quality that top rhythmic gymnasts display. It's a characteristic that Berg is proud to admit she possesses. She loves tournaments, especially the opportunity to test herself against girls from other clubs.

Lately, she's grown very fond of the rope and clubs apparatuses. Clubs are difficult to master while rope events lend themselves to a great deal of creativity, she said.

The Valentine Classic was the club's first ever event, said Studin, whose daughter, Rebecca, trained at the club for six years and was nationally ranked. It proved a tremendous success, with a total of 10 regional clubs participating. Some clubs had to be turned down because they could not be accommodated.

Sixteen Aspirals girls aged seven to 13 participated in the meet. Berg, Cappe, 12, and Gurau,13, were veterans of the tournament circuit. All three participated two years ago in the provincial championships, with Berg finishing second and Gurau third. Cappe has shown "major improvement this year," Studin said.

Generally, girls who don't advance to the national stage – a level that is much like a full time job – compete until age 15 or 16. At that point their bodies change, younger, more nimble girls eclipse them, and they start developing other interests. Those who wish to remain in the sport usually switch to coaching and choreography.

Still, the lessons learned as competitors serves them well in later life, Studin said."They stay fit and the girls are usually good in school. They have to be good at time management, organization and discipline."

Private approach needed?

As I was saying...

By RON CSILLAG

One of the biggest noodges to come along in years is back in the community, and I, for one, couldn't be happier.

Lillian Freedman, a self-described "freelance" social worker, is a study in contrasts: a soft-spoken yet iron-willed woman who has won few popularity contests with the Jewish "establishment."

Freedman isn't necessarily out to afflict the comfortable; just to comfort the afflicted. Her crusade to do more about the Jewish homeless in Toronto has been resurrected, in part, in the wake of publicity surrounding a 61-year-old Jewish former Bay Street analyst who has landed among the homeless (CJN, March 15). The man, who has been touched by his one-time colleagues' many offers of help, nevertheless now lives at Seaton House, a city-owned men's hostel that houses 500 indigents. As you can probably guess, it's not a very pleasant place.

Freedman is no fan of big shelters that throw together the simply down-on-their-luck with alcoholics, drug addicts and the violent or potentially violent. As she sees it, even the street is sometimes better.

Neither does she feel that handing out soup and sandwiches from the back of a van is the answer.

While Jewish Family & Child Service secures emergency funds to prevent people from being evicted, tops up welfare and can find social housing when it becomes available, Freedman sees a vacuum when it comes to the community's provision of a bridge – a place homeless Jews can go while they re-build their lives.

So now, she has assembled a group of like-minded individuals to begin what she hopes will be the community's first private effort to house the Jewish homeless. Freedman and her group of about six will meet soon to discuss renting a house (or ideally, getting one donated) near the downtown core that would serve as a non-profit shelter for Jews with no place else to go.

She envisions a fully kosher transitional residence, but not for those suffering from major health problems.

"I want it to be the Jewish community's response to homelessness in the community," she says. "It's very simple. It would be the place to go if you run into trouble and you turn to your community."

While non-Jews would not be turned away, its focus would be on Jewish homeless, the way various Native residences cater to the aboriginal homeless.

The model for all this comes from Israel, where Freedman spends half the year, also working with that country's growing ranks of homeless. Israel, it seems, is light-years ahead of North America when it comes to the problem. In Tel Aviv, seven city-paid social workers rotate hitting the streets every night, accompanied by police or security, patrolling for homeless. After finding them, "they stick with them," Freedman says. "They hang on and on until the person is OK, and they see things right through until the end. They work to get the human being back. The whole approach is very dignified and balabatish."

How many people are we talking about? Two years ago, Freedman found five homeless Jews; JF&CS discovered more than two dozen. Asked to estimate how many homeless Jews she believes there are in Toronto currently, Freedman responds with a twist on a book title well known to many: "One is too many."

She's no do-gooder or '60s radical, she stresses; just someone acting on the Jewish principle of tikkun olam. She hopes others feel the same way.

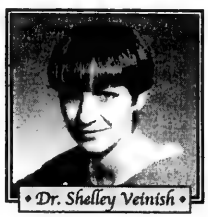
Seniors & Health



• Dr. Shelley Veinish •

Dear Dr. Veinish,

I'm a woman who just turned 60. I feel in good shape but I worry about getting osteoporosis. What should I be doing to reduce the risk?

Mara B.

Dear Mara,

Osteoporosis affects many more women than men, although it's not exclusively a "woman's disease." It's often silent, until a person experiences a fracture, usually in the spine, wrist or hip. Women tend to develop symptoms earlier than men, often within the first 10 years following menopause. This is due to a drop in natural estrogen levels.

Ideally, prevention begins during adolescence, with a well-balanced diet and active lifestyle. It's not surprising that many people are unaware of their requirements for calcium and vitamin D. Adults between 50 and 70 years of age require 1,200 mg of calcium per day.

Dairy products are a rich source of calcium. Milk substitutes and soy products do not provide this nutrient unless they are specifically labelled "fortified with calcium." For many older adults, calcium supplementation is necessary because their dietary intake is inadequate. The Osteoporosis Society of Canada (416-696-2663) publishes a handy Calcium Fact Sheet, which lists common foods and their calcium content.

What about vitamin D? This vitamin is necessary for the absorption of calcium. Milk is a good dietary source of vitamin D, but it's often inadequate alone to meet daily requirements. The requirement for the 50 to 70-year-old group is generally 400 IU per day, an amount readily available in most multivitamins for "seniors." Be aware that the requirements for both calcium and vitamin D increase with age and if you already have osteoporosis.

I encourage you to exercise regularly, to build and maintain strong bones and muscles. This will help promote good balance and hopefully reduce your risk of falls and fractures. Brisk walking and tai chi are two exercises that may be beneficial.

While preventive measures throughout life are vital, there is also a role for medications in the prevention and management of osteoporosis. You should discuss the benefits and risks of hormone replacement therapy with your family physician, in addition to the newer alternatives. Individuals at high risk for osteoporosis, including postmenopausal women, should also discuss a bone mineral density exam to help make the diagnosis. This exam can monitor progression of the disease as well as response to therapy.

Keep active, and remember – successful prevention includes a combination of diet, exercise and sometimes, medication.

Dr. Shelley Veinish is a geriatrician at Baycrest Centre for Geriatric Care and assistant professor in the faculty of medicine at the University of Toronto.

Internet site offers Nazi items

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — In the brave new world of electronic commerce, a problem has recently posed itself to hosts of Internet auctions.

The question is this: When does the sale of collectible items, albeit from the Nazi era, shift from a legitimate pursuit to the promotion of a hateful ideology.

eBay sets strict sale rules

An e-mail letter that circulated recently suggests that for some, the prospect that someone could be profiting from the sale of Nazi memorabilia is disgusting. The letter, which is unsigned, argues that pressure must be brought to bear on Internet auctioneer eBay to "do the right moral thing" and drop the sale of Nazi materials.

The letter writer calls on the public to put "tremendous pressure on eBay to stop selling Nazi memorabilia... I decided that we should not let eBay profit from the blood of six million Jews."

The letter comes on the heels of a November 2000 decision by a French court, which upheld an earlier ruling that ordered Internet giant Yahoo! to bar French users from visiting sites that sold Nazi memorabilia.

Although the decision did not target eBay, the Internet auction company has taken steps to limit the items on its site, said Rabbi Abraham Cooper, associate dean of the Simon Wiesenthal Centre in Los Angeles.

Rabbi Cooper, who has discussed the issue with eBay representatives, said the company has implemented a three-pronged policy to control the items offered for sale. Items that can be sold must be "legitimate materials for legitimate collectors;" they cannot be knock-offs or copies of Nazi-era memorabilia, and no items that promote genocide will be sold, or even posted, on eBay, Rabbi Cooper said.

Rabbi Abraham Cooper

Furthermore, eBay has assigned a troubleshooter to address specific questions about items listed for auction, he said.

"I think this is a very positive step forward," Rabbi Cooper said. "It recognizes the problem and indicates there's somebody monitoring the policy."

Having a "flesh and bones individual" to respond to concerns about the auctioned items is an important measure, Rabbi Cooper said. "At the end of the day, I may not like every answer, but it's a step forward."

As of late last week, a search on eBay using the search word "Nazi" turned up 3,768 items for sale.

The News in Brief

CANADA

Hoof-and-Mouth

TORONTO — Canadian consumers need not worry about hoof-and-mouth disease, says Rabbi Mordechai Levin, executive director of the Kashruth Council of Canada (COR). He has spoken to representatives from Agriculture Canada, he says, and is confident the situation is under control. "We do not take animals that are unhealthy, and the disease has not been transmitted to Canadian livestock," he said.

ISRAEL

Gay Event Flap

JERUSALEM — A controversy is brewing over plans to hold an event in the Knesset commemorating the 25th anniversary of the Association of Gays and Lesbians in Israel. Last week, vandals spray-painted anti-gay graffiti on the home of Labour MK Yael Dayan, an organizer of the event. Religious lawmakers are also reportedly furious over plans to hold the event at the Knesset.

Fate of Jews

JERUSALEM — An Israeli committee on the fate of Jews who disappeared during the military regime in Argentina began hearing testimony this month. The committee is seeking to determine the fate of an estimated 2,000 Jews among the tens of thousands of Argentinians imprisoned, abducted and murdered between 1976 and 1983.

Tourism Drops

JERUSALEM — Tourism to Israel fell by 50 percent in February compared to the same period last year. According to the Israel Tourism Ministry, 104,300 visitors entered Israel last month.

WORLD

Nazi Symbols

LOS ANGELES — The Simon Wiesenthal Centre has filed a protest with South Korea over the use of Nazi symbols by Korean entertainment establishments. The complaints involve the Hitler Techno Bar and Cocktail Show in Pusan, which displayed swastikas, posters and historic photos of Adolf Hitler, and a pool hall called The Gestapo. Last year, a South Korean bakery employed a Hitler look-alike in an advertising campaign, while The Third Reich Cafe also sought to cash in on a Nazi motif. A year ago, a Seoul bar removed its Nazi-theme decor under government pressure after complaints from the centre and the German and Israeli embassies.

Litvak Congress

VILNIUS — Organizers are appealing to Jews from Lithuania to attend the First World Litvak Congress, scheduled from Aug. 24 to 30. The program calls for visits to Jewish schools, cultural centres, libraries, historic sites and the famed Vilnius Yiddish Institute. Trips are planned to the scenes of war-era mass murders of Jews. Meetings with the Jewish community in Vilnius and Kaunas are on the agenda. For details, contact the Jewish Community of Lithuania, Pylimo 4, Vilnius 2001, Lithuania; tel.: 3702-613-003, fax: 3702-227-915 or e-mail: litvaks@litjews.org.

Jedwabne Massacre

WARSAW — Polish authorities removed a stone monument that blamed the Nazis for a World War II massacre of Jews. On July 10, 1941, some 1,600 Jews of the town of Jedwabne were herded into a barn that was then set on fire – not by the Nazis but by Polish villagers, according to a recent book. With the 60th anniversary of the atrocity approaching, there has been much debate in Poland about Poles coming to terms with their own Holocaust-related crimes.

Payments Delayed

NEW YORK — A U.S. judge's refusal to dismiss class-action lawsuits against German companies who used slave labour during World War II will delay payments from a restitution fund, according to a German negotiator, who called the judge's decision "legally wrong."

Jews Blamed

ATHENS — Jews are to blame for Greece's plans to remove religion from the country's identity cards, said the leader of Greece's Orthodox Church. Archbishop Christodoulos said U.S. Jewish leaders persuaded Prime Minister Costas Simitis in 1996 to change the identity cards.

CJC Submits Brief on Language

MONTREAL — Quebec needs a more inclusive immigration policy, Canadian Jewish Congress' Quebec region said last week as a provincial commission completed public hearings into the status of the French language in the province.

CJC-Q said it backs "the desire by the francophone majority to promote French in all areas of public life" in Quebec.

But the rights of others should not suffer because of an unfair advantage to francophone immigrants, Congress said at the end of months of hearings by the government-named commission.

Quebec has focused much of its immigration efforts on French-speaking nations, as a way to compensate for the province's low birth rate.

"French should not be made a criterion for exclusion," said Max Bernard, vice-chair of CJC's Quebec region.

There should be no change in the current eligibility rules for admission to Quebec's English junior colleges, Congress said in its brief.

The commission expects to present a report to the Parti Québécois government by June.

Samaria's students leaders create ties to Canada

By ANNA MORGAN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — A group of 32 students from different communities in the Shomron were welcomed recently by the Jewish community.

"The purpose of the trip is mainly to create leadership within the yishuv," said Rabbi Natan Kandler, who is leading the group from the Shomron, the Hebrew word for Samaria, which is in the West Bank.

Given the situation today in Judea and Samaria, these settlements must face new and difficult challenges, said Rabbi Kandler, who was a student affairs co-ordinator at CHAT for four years before returning to Israel last summer.

He noted that each community needs to have its own leaders – kids who can deal with younger kids – to create programming and become positive figures within their own yishuvim.

"These grade 10 and 11 kids were selected out of 150 that applied to the program."

"They're representatives of a wide spectrum of Israeli society – secular, religious, Ashkenazi and Sephardi. What they all have in common is that they live in the Shomron and face the same daily challenges.

"Just getting to the airport was difficult because some of the roads were literally blocked and they had to find other routes to get out of their yishuvim.

"Some of them bring tragic experiences with them that they want to share with other people."

The delegation has gone to many of the local Jewish day schools, community centres and universities to describe the history of the Shomron and talk about the current situation.

"Some students here have been asked sensitive and problematic questions," Rabbi Kandler noted.

In Nisan, recalling heroes

Among the magnificent, inspiring souls that departed our world four years ago on the fifth day of Nisan was that of Nechama Leibowitz, the renowned, revered and beloved teacher.

Five days later, Chaim Herzog passed away, his soul, too, gathered unto his people in the pre-Pesach anticipation of Nisan.

In an age and a culture increasingly distinguished by values associated with machines and celebrities, economic efficiencies, the lightning quick movement of information, unbounded personal and corporate acquisition and shameless self-interest, it is a comfort before Pesach to recall, even if so very briefly, these two unique individuals. Both Nechama Leibowitz and Chaim Herzog were heroes and leaders of the Jewish people, exemplars, for all generations, of the finest qualities and highest strivings in human beings.

For almost 70 years, Nechama Leibowitz lived humbly but determinedly in her modest apartment in Jerusalem. She arrived in Eretz Yisrael in 1930 at the age of 25.

Born in Riga, Latvia, she studied in Berlin at the Universities of Berlin and Marbourg and received her doctorate in 1930 for her work, "Techniques of Judeo-German Bible Translation in the 15th and 16th Centuries."

Leibowitz was born to be a teacher. That was her life's mission. Incomparably, with rare devotion and single-mindedness of heart, she embraced that mission as a mother embraces her child.

She taught students, she taught teachers, she taught soldiers, she taught scholars. She lectured and delivered biblical commentaries over the radio and wrote her famous gilyonot, her pages of biblical commentary, which were ultimately collated into her precious studies on the parshat hashavua, the weekly biblical portion.

The gilyonot were not for the casual reader. She challenged her pupils to think and delve and dig deeper and deeper into the material to find within it the passageways and insights into the vast wisdom of the Holy Text.

Leibowitz brought a cornucopia of primary Jewish source references into her studies; indeed, if she could refine an insight to a finer edge, she would draw upon her wide scholarship to cite modern commentators and philosophers.

Chaim Herzog

Nechama Leibowitz

Leibowitz was known as "Nechama" to her students. Of all the distinctions, titles and awards that were hers legitimately to use, she preferred simply to use "teacher."

Thousands of people, students all, attended Nechama's funeral. As one, when the last shovels of earth filled the grave, and they could no longer delay bidding farewell to the teacher they loved so dearly, the students recited the kaddish over her soul. The reverential but melancholy sound carried across the hillside like a silk ribbon across an aching heart.

The inscription on her gravestone reads, simply, teacher.

The achievements of Chaim Herzog as soldier, diplomat, scholar and president were like the arching blows of the smith's right hand helping to shape and give strength to the young state through the fire and forge of its early life.

Herzog was born in Belfast, Northern Ireland in 1918 and grew up in Dublin. He was the son of Rabbi Isaac Halevi Herzog who became the second Ashkenazi Chief Rabbi of Israel.

At age 17, he immigrated to Israel where he combined Yeshiva studies with studies in law.

As Herzog's multi-faceted career unfolded, he became the type of person to whom others turned for calm and resolve. In both the British army and then in the nascent IDF, he was a key officer in the intelligence corps.

It was "the melancholy of his fate," to use Martin Buber's phrase, that he would be among the first soldiers to open the gates of the Nazis' concentration camps. It was his voice and his integrity as chief military commentator for Israel Radio that restored the people of Israel's confidence during the difficult hours of the Six Day and Yom Kippur Wars.

History also appointed him to be the voice of the Jewish people to rebut the monstrous United Nations calumny equating Zionism with racism.

"For us, the Jewish people, this is but a passing episode in a rich and event-filled history. We put our trust in our Providence, in our faith and beliefs, in our time-hallowed tradition, in our striving for social advance and human values, and in our people wherever they may be. For us, the Jewish people, this resolution based on hatred, falsehood and arrogance, is devoid of any moral or legal value."

At that point, the eloquent but indignant ambassador tore to shreds the draft resolution. Who will ever forget that stirring yet sorrowful moment?

In this lovely month of Nisan, it is good to recall our Jewish heroes.—MBD

Jewish communities thrive in FSU: rabbi

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — After 70 years of oppression, Jewish communities in the former Soviet Union (FSU) are coming alive, says a teacher at the Institute of Modern Jewish Studies (Machon) in Moscow.

"The Communists tried to destroy our culture, but today [we are] Am Yisrael Chai, and the Reform movement has taken an active part in this process," said Rabbi Chaim Ben-Yaakov.

Rabbi Ben-Yaakov was here recently – his first visit to North America – to raise awareness about his community. He spoke on a panel sponsored by UJA FEDERATION. Also speaking was Rabbi Kinneret Shiryon, Israel's first woman rabbi.

Rabbi Ben-Yaakov is among the first of a group of spiritual leaders born in the FSU who now serve the over 80 progressive Jewish congregations there.

Rabbi Chaim Ben-Yaakov

He moved to Israel in 1988, graduated from Tel Aviv University, and went on to study at Hebrew Union College-Jewish Institute of Religion (HUC-JIR) in Jerusalem.

In 1998, a year before his ordination, the World Union for Progressive Judaism asked him to return to Moscow to serve the growing number of people attracted to progressive Judaism.

Rabbi Shiryon, a native New Yorker who grew up in California, was ordained by HUC-JIR in New York. She was the first woman rabbi to practise in Israel, and established Kehillat Yozma in Modi'in, in 1997. She is still its spiritual leader.

At congregations in the FSU, said Rabbi Ben-Yaakov, volunteers "come together as Jews to learn more about their history and tradition, and they work with great enthusiasm but little budget, which can be as low as $800 a year."

A large proportion of the congregations are made up of young people, and it is interesting to note that many children are teaching Jewish traditions to their parents and grandparents, he said.

Congregations, which vary in size from 10 to several hundred, might hold only Shabbat and holiday services. Some, such as the Machon Institute, offer a variety of programs including Hebrew school, kindergarten, lectures, youth groups, and daily prayers. They also conduct seminars for congregational and lay leaders, he said.

The institute, which was established in 1993, offers a para-rabbinic degree to students who complete the two-year program. "Our congregation offers the first step in the training of rabbis. Currently there are five rabbis at Leo Baeck and one at HUC in Jerusalem who are committed to return to Russia," Rabbi Ben-Yaakov said.

"I stress that we are working, not only for the future of Russian Jewry, but for the future of Israel's movement of progressive Jewry and for Israel society as well.

"One million former Soviet Union citizens live in Israel, and about 70,000 people make aliyah per year. They maintain a good relationship with the FSU. What they think about Judaism is a critical point for future of Israeli society."

Nani Beutel, vice-president of ARZA/World Union in North America, said they are turning to Toronto's Reform community to help support the community in the FSU. "We feel it is our role to bring Judaism to those who want it."

Rabbi Shiryon said that Orthodoxy has such a strong hold on Israeli life that "everyone else has to struggle. The Reform community in Israel is struggling both financially, and because of the non-pluralistic society in which [it exists]."

Israel has not had diverse avenues of Jewish life, she said, "and it is incumbent upon us to redefine who we are as Jews in every generation. That is not happening in Israel. Israelis have pride in their heritage, but not pride in Judaism. The progressive movement is trying to bridge that."

She is currently seeking financial support to build Kehillat Yozma's permanent community centre on the one acre of land that was donated to her by the municipality of Modi'in.

Since its establishment in 1997, Yozma has provided a broad range of services for its community, including religious services, holiday celebrations, life cycle ceremonies, and preschool, elementary and adult educational programs, Rabbi Shiryon said. They started Yozma with a preschool, she said, "not around a prayer culture, because that is not how Israelis identify Jewishly. Education, though, is a high priority in their lives. It is a non-threatening way to draw Israelis [in].

Today, there is a first-grade class, and they are planning a second-grade class next year.

Seen is the candy in question, along with the warning that was sent home by one of the Jewish day schools.

Candies pose danger, says Toronto doctor

By ANNA MORGAN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — A Toronto doctor wants to keep candy that can kill children out of Canada.

"The candies [can] slide into the human windpipe and block and seal it – leading to choking and death within a few minutes," Dr. Warren Goldstein said.

About a year ago, Goldstein saw a four-year-old girl at York Central Hospital who had choked to death on this kind of candy. The candies that caused the death were made in Asia and were not kosher.

However, a similar type of candy emerged in kosher supermarkets and was marketed as Purim snacks. The kosher candies, which were marketed under several names, were also included in Mishloach Manot baskets.

Kashrut Council, BJE receive warnings

The Kashrut Council of Canada and the UJA FEDERATION Board of Jewish Education were alerted to the danger.

"We informed supermarkets under our supervision and they took the products off their shelves," the Kashrut Council's Rabbi Mordechai Levin said. The kosher product may still be available in stores not under the Kashrut Council's jurisdiction.

At the same time, the Board of Jewish Education moved quickly to notify the Jewish day schools of the hazard.

For the past year, efforts have been under way to have these kinds of candies banned in Canada altogether.

"After the incident last year, I happened to see the candy in a convenience store. I was very upset and notified the Canadian Food Inspection Agency," Goldstein said.

Goldstein also said that he discovered a version of the candy manufactured in Asia had caused the death of several other people around the world.

Various agencies in Canada and the United States have been contacted by Goldstein in order to have this type of candy banned.

This particular type of fibre jelly candy has been available for some time in a non-kosher form under various brand names. The kosher candy, however, contains different ingredients, which according to the manufacturer, make it easier to swallow.

However, Goldstein feels that these kinds of candies are dangerous because of their size, shape and consistency.

A tubular-shaped, flavoured gel is moulded around a hard centre. The gel makes it easy for the candy to slip down a person's trachea, Goldstein noted, and the jelly consistency makes a seal. The hard inside adds stability.

Some packages contain a warning label advising of a risk. However, the Canadian Food Inspection Agency noted that in some instances, the products may be sold with no warning label displayed.

"What has been particularly frustrating has been the discovery that the candies cannot be banned from Canada because of an apparent loophole in the Food & Drug Act, which prohibits regulation of substances on the basis of size or shape," Goldstein said.

"Ironically, it is the size, shape and consistency of these candies that poses the danger."

Goldstein has since written to MP Art C. Eggleton and Health Minister Alan Rock in the hope that they will take action to close this loophole. He is also hoping that others will write their members of Parliament.

"It is a bad piece of law," Goldstein said. "These candies are an unnecessary risk and I feel strongly that we should get rid of them."

"DREAMS CAN BECOME REALITY IF YOU BUT WILL IT"
Theodore Herzl

In 1982, on the fifth day of the Lebanon War, 19 year old paratrooper Boaz Tabib was riding in a troop carrier. The truck took a direct hit from an aircraft and exploded on impact.

Two soldiers were instantly killed. Boaz and his best friend were severely wounded. Airlifted to hospital, the two friends remained next door to one another, each fighting for his life. Boaz was not expected to live, but forty days later, it was his friend who died.

Boaz suffered third degree burns to his body. His hands, ears and face were destroyed. He spent 13 months in Hospital.

After being released from hospital Boaz began his involvement with Beit Halochem. Prior to his injury, Boaz especially enjoyed playing basketball. His dream was to participate once again. However, without fingers to hold and shoot a basketball, playing would prove challenging.

At Beit Halochem, Boaz learned new ways to participate in recreational sports. The staff at Beit Halochem along with it's members offered Boaz the support and encouragement he needed to put his newly developed skills to work. Athletics continue to play a major role in Boaz's life.

Fortunately Beit Halochem was there for Boaz when he needed them, and they continue to be there for thousands of other disabled Israeli Veterans – thanks to your support.

Anti-Semitic books found on Indigo's Web site

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — A quirk in a major bookseller's computer system is responsible for advertisements of anti-Semitic books that have been banned by Canada Customs, a company spokesperson said last week.

Indigo Books Music & More last week acknowledged that several books, including the Protocols of the Elders of Zion and the Hoax of the Twentieth Century, could be found on the store's Web site, even though they were not being stocked or sold by the company.

The books were found on the store's Web site as a result of computer links to monthly updates from the Books in Print database, which lists publishers' inventories, said Indigo spokesperson Tracy Nesdoly.

The updates appear on the bookstore's Web site until Indigo matches the new books with its "exceptions file" and removes all books that have been banned by Canada Customs, she said.

"They're hate literature" and Indigo "has no intention in having them for sale," Nesdoly said.

Richard Warman, a volunteer with the Green Party of Canada, raised the issue with Indigo after spotting four prohibited books on the company's Web site one year ago and then again a few weeks ago. In a letter to Indigo president Heather Reisman, Warman pointed out that an Indigo official gave assurances a year ago the titles would be removed from the Web site.

"We're just a little concerned there doesn't appear to be any corporate memory," he said.

Warman learned of the books' availability about a year ago while researching former British Green Party member David Icke, who was booked to speak in Toronto at the time.

Icke's books included bizarre anti-Semitic conspiracy theories and stereotypes. When he looked into other anti-Semitic publications, Warman noticed the Indigo site offered four books that Canada Customs stops at the border. Senior vice-president Dan Mozersky assured him at the time that Indigo would not carry or sell those titles, Warman said.

Warman recently scanned the Indigo site when the controversy flared over anti-Semitic writer Eustace Mullins, whose was slated to appear at the Total Health trade show. That's when he spotted the references to the four books.

Nesdoly said Canadian Jewish Congress had brought the titles to Indigo's attention in the past and the company appreciates any updates. "I want to know if something has slipped past," she said.

Bomb scare a real science project

THORNHILL, Ont. — A "suspicious package" that forced the March 8 evacuation of some 1,000 worshippers from the Sephardic Kehila Centre turned out to be a student's science project, police say.

The package was mistakenly left on the steps of the centre on the night the Purim Megillah was read. Security guards who patrol the building discovered it and called police, who in turn, dispatched the bomb squad (CJN, March 15).

The project was a model hydroplane, complete with wires, a motor and battery – enough to cause police concern.

PC Steve Morrell of York Region Police told The CJN that the student's father called authorities to say the package was harmless.

A bomb squad robot, however, fired a shell into the parcel, following the evacuation of the synagogue in the centre.

No charges will be laid, police said.

Courage and respect to put truth forward

Last week in this space, we commented on the statement by Quebec Premier Bernard Landry that "Canada was of no use" and that it had been "disastrous" for Quebec. The observation by the premier was a gross rhetorical misstatement and was appropriately rebutted by, among others, federal minister of intergovernmental affairs, Stephane Dion. We expressed our regret that "Landry and his separatist colleagues are incapable of seeing, let alone understanding, the precious possibilities in the interweaving of... Canadian and Québécois into one identity."

In his inaugural address to the National Assembly last week as premier, Landry again resorted to flourishes of rhetoric designed as much to stir federalists to anger as to stir separatists to glory. And once again, he paid little heed to the truth.

The federal government's Clarity Act, Landry stated, was "illegitimate," intended to "reduce the powers, the authority, the sovereignty and the legitimacy of the National Assembly and to constrain the democratic will of the Quebec people to self-determine its future."

This characterization of the act was absolutely false. In fact, the Clarity Act affirms the authority of the National Assembly to set forth on its separatist enterprise, but in a manner that is fair and in conformity with the rule of law – Québécois, Canadian and international.

To the offence of misstatement, however, Landry adds surrealism when he invokes the idea of the "democratic will of the Quebec people." The Quebec people have already twice expressed their "democratic will" on the subject of self-determination. And twice, they have rejected the idea. But this is a fact, a present and a historical truth, that is inconvenient to Landry.

Thus he ignores it.

The "democratic will" of the majority of the Quebec people is to have its provincial government set good government – not separatism – as its highest priority. Landry may have a mandate from his party to pursue separation; but he most certainly does not have that mandate from the "Quebec people."

It is the deeply held belief of this newspaper, and often expressed, that the best, most effective way for the French language, culture, ethos, way of life and "civilization" to be protected on this continent against the inevitable cultural and linguistic encroachments of globalization and international corporatization is through the mechanisms of the fully bilingual institutions of the larger, more "muscular," more assertive federal institutions in partnership with the confident, creative institutions of the government of Quebec and other provincial governments as well.

That separatists such as Landry feel otherwise is not surprising. But at least they should have the courage and the respect to put forward the truth about the other, federalist, side of the argument when appealing to the Quebec people.

Disabilities coverage lacking in CJN

Isn't it funny how we always read about Jews who live in different parts of the world or Jews who have suffered from persecution and anti-Semitism? With last week's CJN being an exception, I don't often read about Jews who suffer from various disabilities, such as myself. Is it that they don't have a voice to speak up and speak out? I don't envy them, just as I don't envy those individuals who have suffered physical and emotional pain from war.

I am a woman who is hard of hearing, and it is high time that people, and especially Jews, try to understand what it's like to live as a disabled person: how educated human beings haven't an inkling what it's like for us, why, for example, I don't go to synagogue anymore, why we see life and its barriers as frustrating.

I suppose the only solution I see is for humankind to become more sensitive, understanding and accepting of one another. This is very hard to do, since cultural differences always get in the way. However, if people were to give more of themselves rather than rushing off with the excuse that they had no time, we would be that much better as an "abled" population.

Researching Yiddish schools, camps

I am interested in information about Yiddish secular schools and summer camps across Canada between the years 1925 and 1955, to be used in a research project documenting these important institutions.

The primary sponsors of these educational institutions were: The Workmen's Circle/Arbeiter Ring, the Farband/Labour Zionist Order, UJPO and the Sholem Aleichem Institute.

Perhaps documentation on the history of your own local Jewish community might include pertinent information that CJN readers could share with me. I would appreciate hearing from individuals who attended or whose families and friends were involved in such schools and camps.

Particularly difficult to document are the Yiddish schools in Edmonton, Windsor and Ottawa, and the following camps: Kindervelt and Kinderland in Quebec, Naivelt, Kinderland, Yungvelt, Nit Gedayget in Ontario.

There may even have been camps or supplementary schools in smaller communities, which do not appear in the archival material that I have researched at the Canadian Jewish Congress and the Montreal Jewish Public Library.

I may be reached at the following: Until May 1: 415 E. 80th St. Apt. 4T, New York, N.Y., 10021; or fradle@bjeny.org. After May 4: Harzfeld 9, 46661 Herzlia, Israel; or fradlef@aol.com

Questioning story selection

Zev Schiff's story, "Sharon is ready to move Gaza settlers" (CJN, March 22), was denied the very same day by Rehavam Ze'evi, a minister in Prime Minister Ariel Sharon's government, and Foreign Minister Shimon Peres said the same day that he had no knowledge of such a plan. This was on the Ha'aretz Web site. You decided to run this rumour/story anyway as your lead story.

Are you wishing it was true? Such rumours belittle your paper and your journalistic standard. Schiff may be a veteran defence reporter, but in Sharon's administration he is an outsider, unlike in Ehud Barak's.

Overreaction to group's ad

Re: Anti-Israel Ad (CJN, March 15), I find the Orthodox Rabbinical Council's apoplectic reaction to the ad placed in the National Post by the Neturei Karta troubling.

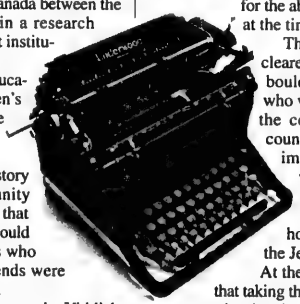
I, too, am distressed that there are Jews who do not support Israel's existence. I would hope that all Jewry and in fact, all fair-minded people, subscribe to the idea that the Jewish people should not be singled out to live without a country.

The Zionist idea, born in the late 1800s, contained the premise that the Jewish state was to be the remedy for the abnormal conditions of Jewish life at the time.



The early immigrants to Israel who cleared the fields of rocks, stones and boulders, who drained the swamps, who worked the land, who fought for the country and who died for the country, were motivated by a secular impulse. The Zionists at the time were not willing to live with the psychosis of anti-Semitism and struggled to establish a homeland for themselves and for the Jewish people.

At the time, many religious Jews felt that taking the initiative and creating a Jewish state bordered on arrogance and blasphemy. The group that placed the ad are descendants of those who are waiting for the Messiah in order to establish a state.

I certainly do not share their view. I believe they are misguided.

The point is, however, that this small insignificant group harbours views that are irrelevant. Their opinions do not undermine Israel's right to exist. Who exactly is listening to this group?

The views that present a much greater danger to Israel's security are the views of the rabbis that represent the extreme right.

Some kinds of criticism help Israel

Israel is a country that prides itself on its democracy, open debate and free speech; it would certainly be inconsistent if its officials were to urge Jews around the world to refrain from expressing their own opinions. Only in dictatorships are people not permitted to publicly disagree with the country's leaders.

Yossi Beilin, the architect of the Oslo accords, a leading contender to head Israel's Labour party, and until recently the minister of justice, has said:

- "I have criticized [Jewish] organizations for blindly following whatever the Israeli government says... If you don't like [the Oslo agreement] and think it is too dangerous, I want to know" (Jerusalem Post, Oct. 22, 1993).
- "Regarding American Jews – I want them to express their opinions, even if it's opposed to my policies" (Jerusalem Post, Oct.13, 1995).

Morton A. Klein

On a similar note, Foreign Minister Shimon Peres has said to American Jewish leaders: "You have the right to take a position on what will happen to the Jewish people" (Jerusalem Post, Dec.29, 1995).

During his recent visit to Washington, Israeli Prime Minister Ariel Sharon emphasized that Jerusalem and Israel belong to the entire Jewish people, not just Israeli residents. "We are only the caretakers of Jerusalem, it belongs to all of world Jewry," he said. "Israel is an international Jewish enterprise."

There are clearly many American Jewish leaders who support the right to speak out on issues affecting the future of Jerusalem and Israel. Just a few months ago, 32 major Jewish leaders signed a public statement (which we at the Zionist Organization of America [ZOA] organized) headlined, "Israel Must Not Surrender Judaism's Holiest Site, the Temple Mount." It appeared as an advertisement in leading newspapers in the United States and Israel. The ad was signed by, among others, six past chairmen of the Conference of Presidents of Major American Jewish Organizations, the presidents of B'nai Brith and Hadassah, the past chair of the UJA Federation of New York, and major leaders of the Conservative and Orthodox movements.

The ad appeared at a time when there was growing international pressure on Israel to surrender the Temple Mount to Yasser Arafat, and media reports indicated the Barak government was ready to succumb to the growing Arab and international pressure for such a surrender. Another ZOA advertisement which appeared in newspapers last year, expressing public concern about one-sided Israeli concessions, was signed by numerous Jewish leaders, including eight leaders of AIPAC, a major pro-Israel lobby.

When Diaspora Jews publicly disagree with an Israeli government for giving away too much, they strengthen Israel's hand. Disagreements enable Israeli leaders to point to their critics as proof of the widespread Jewish opposition to too many Israeli concessions. When Arafat is urged to compromise on Jerusalem, he insists that Muslims around the world would oppose any compromise, and he is obligated to represent them, not just his own constituents.

When Diaspora Jews publicly criticize Israel for giving away too little, it puts pressure on Israel to give away more. It encourages the Arabs to take more extreme positions at the negotiating table. When the Arabs see they have allies among the Jews, it gives them hope that those Jewish allies may influence the Israeli government to soften its position – or may persuade Washington to pressure Israel.

For Diaspora Jews who sincerely care about Israel's well-being, the central principle should not be the theoretical right to speak out; it must be how to speak out in a responsible way that will help, not hurt, Israel. It is the practical consequences, the actual impact on Israel, which matters most.

Imagine how different things would be today if, during the past eight years, Jewish leaders around the world had spoken out against Israel making one-sided concessions while Arafat continued building a terrorist army and promoting his culture of anti-Semitic hatred and violence in the media, schools, summer camps, officials' speeches and religious sermons. There would have been less pressure on Israel to keep making risky concessions to the Palestinian Arabs. Arafat would have come under pressure to change his ways. And if he did not change, the United States would not have supplied Arafat with over $900 million, which freed up the funds he has used to build up the de facto army that is now constantly attacking and murdering Israelis.

Wouldn't that have been much better than the dangerous situation in which Israel now finds itself?

Morton A. Klein is national president of the Zionist Organization of America.

Israeli, not Diaspora, Jews make ultimate sacrifices

To understand how the Canada-Israel Committee (CIC) views its role in the so-called Israel-Diaspora debate – whether Jewish community organizations in the Diaspora should officially take positions that contradict the stated policies of the government of Israel – it is necessary to first appreciate the constitutional framework under which the CIC must operate.

The CIC is an umbrella organization, consisting of a number of other mainstream Canadian Jewish organizations (B'nai Brith Canada, Canadian Jewish Congress, Canadian Zionist Federation, UIA Federations Canada and numerous Jewish federations and communities across the country). Through this consolidated mechanism, the CIC develops policy positions through consensus and presents a unified voice and co-ordinated actions on Israel-related matters, especially regarding vital Canada-Israel bilateral matters.

Joe Wilder Q. C.

There is an implicit understanding that while the constituent organizations may subscribe to many different ideological and political points of view, we all come together as the CIC. We are constitutionally bound to act in a non-partisan, politically neutral manner. I say "constitutionally" bound because the adoption of non-partisanship is an inherent feature of the bylaws that the partner organizations adopted when they signed on to the constitution.

The CIC and its partners, then, are obliged to refrain from publicly expressing positions that may be interpreted as politically partisan within the Israeli context. This means not only refusing to take sides on non-consensus issues (e.g. settlement activity), which do arise in both Israel and in the Canadian Jewish community, but also refusing to officially dissent from an Israeli government position when it concerns even a traditional consensus issue such as the unity of Jerusalem.

Should Diaspora Jews publicly criticize Israel's foreign and security policies?

Let me be clear. This does not mean that the CIC will automatically support whatever policy the Israeli government of the day may adopt, especially on non-consensus issues. The CIC's main task is not to lobby on behalf of the Israeli government – that is the primary responsibility of the Israeli Embassy and consulates in Canada. The CIC's principal role is to represent the organized Jewish community in Canada on matters concerning Israel and to be supportive on Israeli-related issues where there is consensus in our community.

Recently, various individuals in the community signed an advertisement published in The CJN concerning the Israeli government's position on the Jerusalem issue. Although no organization per se was asked to endorse the ad, neither I nor the presidents of Canadian Jewish Congress and B'nai Brith Canada signed on. For my part, I have a concern that when presidents or other leaders of organizations speak out, their views are often interpreted as those of the institution they represent.

The question arises as to whether prominent members or leaders of major organizations ought to speak out as individuals. No one prefers to limit the right of people to speak freely. However, when controversial initiatives get started and pit individuals or organizations against one another, it creates communal divisiveness. This, in turn, impairs our collective ability to make Israel's case effectively. In my view, it becomes a matter of conscience for each of us to act responsibly, in the community's best interests.

In considering the dilemma, one might distinguish between issues that are entirely "Jewish" (for example, the 'who is a Jew' question), and those, such as the peace process, which have an "external" dimension. On matters that are fundamentally "internal," particularly when communal positions are not taken, more latitude is appropriate.

We in the Diaspora, who care deeply and passionately about Israel, must always remember that we are not required to make the same sacrifices as are the Israelis themselves. We must recognize that the ultimate responsibility for decisions affecting their own security is borne by Jews in Israel.

Over the last half-century, Israel's priorities have centred on the relief for, and rescue of, Jews in danger, such as in the former Soviet Union and Ethiopia. With changing global dynamics, both in a secular and Jewish sense, I expect that Israel will be diverting more of its attention to North American Jewry. I also perceive an increasing willingness to engage our views on internal Israeli issues. Perhaps in the evolution of this relationship, our role in Canada, may, through mutual agreement, become different from what it is today.

Arab Anti-Semitism

The headline is, of course, an oxymoron, for the Arabs themselves are Semites. The fact is, however, that "anti-Semitism" is today understood as directed against Jews only. It is largely based on a concoction of myths central to which is the belief that Jews not only want to control the world, but are in fact already doing it by a variety of devious means.

Rabbi Gunther Plaut in Toronto

Much of this belief is based on the Protocols of the Elders of Zion, the infamous anti-Semitic tract that was fabricated by the Russian secret police over 100 years ago and made its appearance shortly after World War I in Europe.

Thus the editor of a prestigious Egyptian weekly wrote not long ago: "A Jew is a Jew, and hasn't changed for thousands of years. He is base, contemptible, scorns all moral values, gnaws on live flesh and sucks blood for pittance. The Jewish Merchant of Venice is no different from the arch-executioners of Deir Yasin, and those of the [Palestinian] refugee camps. Both are similar models of inhuman depravity."

One of the elements of this propaganda is the charge that the Jews want to own and occupy Egypt, "because this is Moses' place of origin; they also want Syria and Lebanon, because their temple was built from Lebanon's cedars; they have set their sights both on Iraq, the birthplace of Abraham the Patriarch, and the Hijaz, Ishmael's birthplace; and they want to have Jordan as well because it is part of Palestine and used to be part of Solomon's kingdom."

Not too long ago, the late Syrian president Hafez al-Assad expressed the same sentiment when he said: "They do not want only another Arab country... they want to impose their hegemony beyond that until it covers the entire world."

The sad part in all of this is the fact that spreading such hatred of Israel makes an ultimate reconciliation between Israelis and Arabs ever more difficult. "Kill every Jew wherever you find him," said a prominent Arab leader recently.

How can there be peace between Israel and its Arab neighbours when the latter are constantly exposed to allegations that picture Jews as inherently evil, untrustworthy, dominant and enjoying the spilling of Arab blood? To perpetrators of this mythology, Israel is and remains an illegal creation and is therefore deprecatingly referred to as "the Zionist entity" that must be fought until it is destroyed. Arab children are taught this challenge as a historical necessity.

Until this kind of world view is rooted out, I remain pessimistic about the future. I do not like to write this, but I have to deal with realities, and they are, alas, unpleasant.

Keeping an eye on our youth

A few weeks ago the annual Youth Shabbaton took place in the Atlantic Region. Participants between the ages of eleven and seventeen spent an intense weekend together at a cozy resort in Wolfville, Nova Scotia while engaging in workshops about Israeli culture, the current conflict in Israel and small community issues. There were approximately 60 youth and 15 staff leaders in attendance.

Darcie Richler in Halifax

As well as working with the university students in Halifax as a volunteer, I am the youth program director for the Atlantic Jewish Council (AJC) and a staff member of Camp Kadimah. The AJC position has given me the opportunity to work with intelligent, deep-thinking and enthusiastic teenagers. No doubt they will bring strong leadership and positive change to our various Jewish communities and also to the world in years to come. This particular group has a real sense of ruach, and while many of them do not see each other on a regular basis, they have strong bonds that keep them in touch throughout the year.

We may forget a bit too quickly what it was like to be in high school, let alone elementary school. With the recent, painful episodes of youth violence in North America, we have to ponder what is really going on with adolescents these days. Not trying to level a criticism towards anyone or to place blame on any specific aspect of teenage life, I'd like to put forward some observations to hopefully open the eyes of those who may at times not see what is going on.

Having attended a high school with a significant Jewish population in Toronto, I can still relate to the pressures and various social issues that youth feel. Now in my work, it is from a different perspective. Most adults interacting with children up to grade 12 would make the same observations.

While the Shabbaton weekend was marvelous (and I will report on some of the insightful programming in a future column), I felt a small sense of melancholy as well. Not being part of the peer group, I observed the relationships of these 60 children from a different angle. I was in a position to see who was "cool" (whatever that word really means...) and who was "not." Luckily in this group, there was no one severely picked on for not being "cool"; nor was there anyone specifically ostracized.

Yet there were small issues that constantly needed to be dealt with that could have turned into bigger problems. It is easy (and frustrating) to see when a child is being excluded or hurt, because of a perceived appearance or personality "flaw" or simply because they don't fit in.

It's difficult to believe that teachers, youth leaders, counselors or parents do not see who the "ringleaders" are and who is on the receiving end. While it might seem that children do not want our intervention in these types of problems, it is imperative that if we do notice them, we put a stop to them right away. There are subtle ways to deal with a child who has low self-esteem, and at the same time, bullies must be put in their place somehow and the message must be relayed that bullying is not tolerated.

I'm young enough to remember the harmful and sometimes scarring effects on those at high school who were mistreated, and old enough to know that I can work in a position of leadership where it can be prevented. We must all take the danger signs seriously before they turn into violence directed inwardly or at others.

To all those who come into regular contact with children, and especially to the camp counselors this coming summer, it is your obligation to keep your eyes open. If you see something that doesn't look "right" – a child who is withdrawn or a child who is a bully, or anything simply unusual – do not think that "someone else" is going to deal with it. It is up to us all to stop the abusive and low self-esteem issues that are facing our youth. A real leader does not sit back and allow a child to be fed to the wolves. If you are in a position where you can help, do so. We all depend on it.

The Passover ritual

Where does the time go? When you read this, I will have one more exam to go, and the familiar smell of fried matzah will be right around the corner.

My previous articles have tended to stay away from discussing the holidays. I'm not sure why, but maybe because none of the other holidays has the same impact on me as Passover.

Bryan Borzykowski in Winnipeg

Claiming that Pesach is my favourite holiday does not make me unique. I know many people who would share this same sentiment. Why is it so special? You can't eat what you want, and that is something very difficult to maintain, especially when you are at university all day studying. After the seders, what is the point? Well. I will tell you why I think this holiday is so important – family and culture.

Those two words are very important to me, and Pesach emphasizes both. While every Jewish holiday is deeply rooted in culture and history, Pesach is the only one that you can actually read about in your home. For two days every year, we are reminded of our history, of how our people persevered and overcame the hardships of slavery in Egypt.

Living in Winnipeg does not always engender a feeling of Jewish pride, but reading these stories gives me a sense of belonging to a larger community. I find it remarkable that almost every Jewish home will be filled with people reading this story and learning about the plight of the Jews. Being a 21-year-old living in a Christian society does not always lend itself to feeling passionate about something Jewish.

I also love the food. Of course there is a cultural aspect to eating matzah, but it also provides you with one week out of the year for interesting alternatives to a student's fast food diet.

Family. For me this is even more important than learning about the culture. As I get older and face more responsibilities, it seems that getting together with family gets placed on the back burner more often. For the two days of Passover, I am able to put all my other commitments aside and participate in a ritual that has always been a part of my life.

It is quite interesting to see how seders have developed over the years. I remember when the young ones at the table were just my brother and I and my two cousins. My uncle would always sing Dayeinu, adding strange noises at the end of each phrase, which sent us into fits of laughter. Years later, he still makes those noises, and while my brother and I still chuckle, my three new cousins are the ones keeping him going.

The ritual of our Pesach seder has had many other constants. For example, another uncle of mine always hides the afikoman in the exact same place every year. When we were younger, it was always a challenge to find it, but as we got older, we began to humour him, pretending we didn't know where it was until we'd had enough, and then we quickly "found" the hidden piece of matzah. Fortunately, our little cousins can be genuine in their quest for afikoman, as they have yet to figure my uncle out.

This year will be a unique Passover for my family. We are heading to Toronto for the first time in 20 years to spend the holiday with a paternal aunt and cousins. It will be interesting to see the rituals of my dad's side of the family, and how we become a part of that.

There are other, more secular aspects about the timing of the holiday that contribute to Passover being my favourite holiday. Spring is usually approaching and school is nearing an end (and when I was in high school we got the week off). While these things have nothing to do with Pesach, they contribute to an overall sense of happiness and contentment that, in combination with culture and family, make this holiday one to cherish.

The Kirshner File

The Holocaust and the collective memory of Jews

Prime Minister Mackenzie King of Canada announced new immigration regulations in a speech before the House of Commons on May 1, 1947. "The policy of the government," he said, "is to foster the growth of the population... by the encouragement of immigration."

Sheldon Kirshner in Toronto

Shortly afterward, in a bid to capitalize on King's initiative and the shortage of skilled workers in the needle trade, the Canadian Jewish Congress submitted a request asking Ottawa to admit Jewish workers and their families to Canada. The submission, co-sponsored by trade unions, the Jewish Labour Committee and the Jewish Immigrant Aid Society, was made in response to the plight of Holocaust survivors languishing in displaced persons camps in Germany.

In October of that year, 2,136 tailors and furriers were permitted to settle in Canada under Order-in-Council 2180. My father, a tailor, was in this group. He had been a soldier in the Polish army when Germany invaded Poland in 1939. Released from captivity in Germany, he was dispatched to the Lodz ghetto, which turned out to be the last in Nazi-occupied Europe to be liquidated.

Thanks to Order-in-Council 2180, my parents – David and Genia – and I were able to leave Europe. We arrived in Montreal in February 1948 by way of two ports, Halifax and Hamburg. Within days of settling in, my father started working at Stein & Gerson, a ladies' garment manufacturing company.

The lobbying Canadian Jewish Congress exerted on behalf of Jewish refugees like my parents was a shining example of the response of Canada's Jewish community to the Holocaust and its aftermath.

In fact, however, Canadian Jews went through three post-war phases in reacting to the Holocaust, Franklin Bialystok observes in Delayed Impact: The Holocaust and the Canadian Jewish Community (McGill-Queen's University Press).

From 1945 to 1960, he writes in this important book, the legacy of the Holocaust received short shrift, notwithstanding humanitarian efforts on the part of Jewish organizations. During the second period, 1960 to 1973, a collective memory of the Holocaust gradually emerged. In the third phase, 1973 to 1985, the Holocaust became a "marker" of ethnic identification for Canadian Jews. As he puts it: "By 1985 most Canadian Jews felt that the destruction of European Jewry was their loss as well."

Bialystok, whose study is based on previously unexamined documents and interviews with Jewish community leaders, says that the community's response was relatively limited in the first period: providing relief for Jewish survivors in Europe, lobbying for their admission to Canada, arranging their transportation to this country and, finally, absorbing them.

Although Canadian Jews were removed from the Holocaust by space, time and experience, they rallied behind the bedraggled survivors. In 1946, Canadian Jewish Congress established a relief fund to improve their conditions, then called on Canada to admit these refugees. From April 1947 to March 1950, some 15,500 survivors, including more than 1,100 orphans, immigrated to Canada, the largest three-year migration of Jews to this country in about 35 years. The economy was booming and these immigrants could make a contribution both as workers and consumers.

With their arrival, the community tried to attend to their occupational, social, educational and psychological needs. In Bialystok's view, Jewish organizations were ill-equipped to deal adequately with the problems of the majority of survivors. Furthermore, he adds, there was little interest in their experiences, judging by his analysis of the Jewish Chronicle, the key English-language newspaper in the community after the war.

To be sure, the Jewish Chronicle carried stories about displaced persons camps and this or that project sponsored by the community. But it showed no apparent interest in how they had survived and what they had lost. Surprisingly, the Yiddish press was also deficient in its coverage, he argues.

If we are to believe Bialystok, the Holocaust was swept under the rug by many Jews right after the war. He quotes Cyril Levitt – a third-generation Canadian Jew born in Toronto – as saying it was regarded as a kind of "a disease that one didn't talk about."

Bialystok claims that Saul Hayes, the director of the Canadian Jewish Congress, had practically nothing to say about the impact of the Holocaust on Canadian Jews. This neglect, he speculates, had more to do with his background as a macher and his connections than any deliberate evasion of the issue.

Jewish schools compiled a mixed record with respect to the Holocaust. Toronto's Beth Tzedec Congregation school purposely omitted it from the curriculum on the grounds that it would traumatize students. On the other hand, Montreal's Jewish People's School stressed its importance. Bialystok believes that ideologically-driven schools were more likely to teach the Holocaust.

David and Genia Kirshner and their two children, Marilyn and Sheldon, in 1948 or 1949.

In short, according to Bialystok, the community was virtually devoid of Holocaust consciousness during the 1950s. "Most Canadian Jews did not want to know what happened, and few survivors had the courage to tell them."

A change took place between 1960 and 1973, which was precipitated by a number of inter-related factors: an upsurge of neo-Nazism in West Germany and the proposed imposition of a Statute of Limitations for Nazi war criminals, the emergence of neo-Nazi groups in Canada, the trial of German war criminal Adolf Eichmann in Israel and the outbreak of the Six Day War and of the Yom Kippur War, which highlighted the fragility of Israel's security.

Due to these developments, Canadian Jewish Congress co-opted survivors, created the Holocaust Remembrance Committee, and persuaded the federal government to pass legislation to criminalize hate propaganda.

After 1985, the Holocaust was firmly incorporated into the community's collective consciousness.

Survivors, having become active in Jewish community affairs, created an assortment of projects that elevated knowledge of the Holocaust. Then the media appropriated it, and courses and conferences on it became commonplace at Canadian universities. And, as Bialystok reminds us, "a Holocaust industry become a feature of North American popular culture."

He contends that None Is Too Many – the 1982 book that documented Canada's abysmal immigration policy from 1933 to 1945 – was another catalyst in raising Holocaust consciousness. "Concurrent with this event was a growing realization that [Canada] had knowingly allowed suspected Nazi war criminals to enter the country," he notes.

The Holocaust denial trials of Ernst Zundel and James Keegstra, together with Ottawa's decision to formally investigate the presence of suspected war criminals in Canada through the Deschenes Commission, were also instrumental in exposing the Holocaust to the general public.

Lastly, the Holocaust became "a pillar of self-definition" among some Jews.

Rightly so, Bialystok is concerned about this trend. "For an ethnic community to wrap its identity around its own victimization is counter-productive to its vitality." This phenomenon bears further consideration and examination.

Unity not uniformity at Pesach

By RABBI YEHIEL BEN AYON

On Pesach the children of Yaakov became the People of Israel. A family became a nation. Yet, the Torah persists on calling us Bnei Yisrael – the children of Israel. We are destined to always remain perpetual children of Israel. A nation, yes, but always a family. A family shares and enjoys unity, and as a nation, we certainly value and treasure this ideal of unity.

Unity, however, does not in any way mean uniformity. There can be much diversity within a unity. A family unit remains united, even though its members may all pursue their own separate ways and personal identities. The Jewish nation too can be diversified, as each member or group pursues its own separate ways or identities and still be united under the umbrella of the Torah.

Perhaps the greatest separation of identity between the Sephardi and Ashkenazi families occurs in our respective adherence to the holiday of Pesach. Here, what is appropriate and acceptable consumption for one, is not acceptable to another. I refer to kitniyot.

Long ago, the rabbinic leadership of Ashkenazi Jewry listed and outlawed legumes, or kitniyot in Hebrew, from their Pesach menu. The Sephardim did not. To this day, they eat kitniyot.

Certainly, there is only one Torah. This Torah, of course, identifies chametz exclusively as the result of combining water and the five grains: wheat, rye, oats, barley and spelt. Any thing else is not, nor will it ever become chametz.

Why then did the rabbis of Ashkenazi persuasion further forbid the eating of things such as rice, beans, peanuts, peas, corn, lentils, soybeans etc.? The rabbis of that time feared that one could possibly confuse one of these, with one of the five grains. For example, flour made of corn or rice could certainly be confused with grain flour. Therefore, the rabbis seeing no particular undue hardship in this new ruling went ahead with it.

Consider that today, from corn alone, we derive liquid oil, vegetable shortening, sweeteners, starch, fibre supplements and more! But of course then, this wasn't an issue at all. Processed food is a product of this century.

(Actually, this was even less of an issue, as in any event corn did not exist. Corn is a new food that only made it to Europe 500 years ago!) Why worry about something that doesn't yet exist!

Wherever the possibility of hardship was real, such as with potatoes, which can also make a very passable flour, the rabbis didn't forbid consumption. After all, in Ashkenazi lands, Pesach arrived after a long and frozen winter. The basic diet of Ashkenazi Jewry was made up of meat grains and root vegetables – potatoes, onions and carrots that could be stored all winter in a root cellar. Peas and corn in April were nowhere to be found. Forbidding their use on Pesach caused no inconvenience whatsoever!

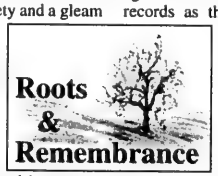
For the Sephardim, kitniyot (legumes) were not exotic treats or summer foods, but staples. Forbidding their use would have been considered a hardship for the Jews of Sephardi lands, and thus, the rabbis did not feel the need to forbid them. They remain today very much a part of the Pesach menu.

Hence, what is kosher l'Pesach for one is not for the other. This presents a somewhat awkward situation; an Ashkenazi cannot accept hospitality and sit and eat in the home of a Sephardi during Pesach. While this may be inconvenient and unfortunate for all, when properly understood, it is not an item of disunity but an exercise in mutual respect. The Sephardi and Ashkenazi are both upholding a diverging but legitimate tradition within Judaism.

A treasure trove on north Bathurst Street

By ZE'EV GLICENSTEIN

Ask Stephen Speisman about the 80-year-old minute books of Toronto's Kielcer Society and a gleam appears in his eyes.



Director of the Ontario Jewish Archives, Speisman has long been seeking early records of landsmanshaft, mutual benefit and like societies in Toronto and other Jewish communities in Ontario. But too often such records get stashed in dusty basements and ultimately trashed.

By chance, the widow of a once-active Kielcer told him her husband "had some books in the basement that he used to go down and look at, every so often." She was sure they were nothing. He persuaded her to show them to him, and lo – "they were the Kielcer Society records, in beautiful Yiddish writing, going right back to the twenties. That's the kind of treasure we get sometimes."

Again through happenstance, the late Sol Edell, a key early volunteer at the archives, learned that some important Jewish communal medical records of the Folksverein, the former social service agency headquartered on Beverley Street, had already been loaded onto a truck bound for the city dump.

Edell, the story goes, jumped into his car in pursuit of the records, stopping only long enough to hire two labourers. "They followed the garbage truck to the dump, and managed to save a small portion of the records as the crusher was coming along," Speisman says.

Now housed at the archives, the Folksverein documents show the medical treatments that thousands of Toronto Jews received from the 1920s forward. (Due to privacy considerations, viewing restrictions apply.)

One recent Pesach, officials of the Eitz Chaim school on Viewmount Avenue pried up some loose floorboards on the stage in the lunchroom, and uncovered a horde of old institutional and student records from the school's former days on D'Arcy Street. Again, the material ended up in the archives.

Such discoveries lend excitement to the professional lives of Speisman and assistant archivist Howard Markus, who spend their work days chasing down and cataloguing worthy materials, overseeing a staff of dedicated volunteers, and trying to bring order to the archives' vast and seemingly chaotic holdings.

"I haven't done an inventory in a long time, and I couldn't venture a guess as to the size of the collection," Speisman says of the vast assortment of materials housed partly in the archives' vault and handling areas in the Lipa Green Building, and partly in a remote warehouse.

Finding aids? Binders and printed lists suffice for many of the collections, only a few of which are inventoried on computer. The real finding aids, a visitor soon discovers, are Speisman and Markus themselves.

The institution possesses badges, blueprints, cornerstones and many other historic artifacts. Larger items include some Hebrew signs from "Rabbi Price's old yeshiva on College Street," the tiny desk of former Toronto mayor Phil Givens, and a "No Jews" sign that once adorned the boardwalk on Toronto's Beaches.

For genealogists, there are many sorts of old records – from synagogues, mohels, landsmanshaften, the Jewish Immigrant Aid Society, and so on. Also available are a few old diaries, taped oral histories, microfilms of old Yiddish newspapers, thousands of historic photographs, Toronto Jewish city directories from 1925, 1926 and 1931, and various records from small towns. Although the earliest documents date from 1856, the bulk of materials are from the 1920s through the 1970s.

Funded by the Jewish Federation, the archives also holds a few genealogies related to Ontario families, and both Speisman and Markus say they would welcome more. Research is by appointment. Phone 416-635-2883, ext. 170 or 183.

Online Haggadot available

By MARK MIETKIEWICZ

Over the next few weeks, you are probably going to reach into a familiar drawer and pull out a stack of well-worn and slightly wine-stained Haggadot for Passover. If you take a trip down the Jewish Highway, you will find many stimulating and provocative online Haggadot that could give you new insights at this year's seders.

Most of the Haggadot below are in English, some with Hebrew sections. None require Hebrew fonts. Please be aware that many of these Haggadot contain God's name and should be treated accordingly.

If you are looking for traditional Haggadot, I recommend Laurance Wieder's Red Sea Haggadah [members.aol.com/wiseacrebk/wiederlhag.html] and the Chabad Haggada [passover.net], which offers a straight translation of the Haggadah in addition to a companion commentary.

For insight into how the seder has been observed in Sephardi homes, look at the Sephardi Connection site [sephardiconnect.com/pesah/haggadah.htm].

For an overview of the seder's customs, see Virtual Jerusalem [www.vjholidays.com/pesach/seder.htm], and for more detail, look at Project Genesis's Divrei Torah on Pesach [www.torah.org/learning/yomtov/pesach/].

There are many online Haggadot that represent a great deal of individual effort. Robert Parnes' Hagada [www-personal.umich.edu/~bparnes/HAGGADAH/seder.html] is a synthesis of the traditional and the modern and is set out clearly with responsive readings. Rabbi Mark Hurvitz has printed his own Growing Haggada for the past 20 years and now is making it available online [www.davka.org/what/haggadah/]. He begins with an interesting essay on how the events of Passover have shaped the Jewish people and why the story retains its relevance today. The Rheingold Family Haggadah emphasizes the universal theme of liberation and "invites our friends and family to share this night with Jews all over the world, as we take this opportunity to celebrate our freedom and pray for the freedom of all those who suffer, wherever and whoever they may be" [www.sirius.com/~ovid/haggadah.html]. Rabbi Amy Sheinerman wrote her Haggadah with small children in mind [ezra.mts.jhu.edu/~rabbiars/pesach/haggadah.html].

Another unique version is The Anonymous Haggada: A Synthesis of The Passover Ritual and Liturgy With The Twelve Steps of Recovery By Hershy Worch [www.jewish.com/download/anon_hagadah.txt]. Worch draws a parallel between the Israelites' trek to freedom and the modern-day recovery program used by people to free themselves from various dependencies.

Once you have chosen your Haggadah, you may want to attend a seder. On Friday April 7, you are invited to join a live CyberSeder [www.emanuelnyc.org/seder/seder.html]. Congregation Emanu-El of the City of New York will broadcast its seder over the Web starting at noon local time. You can follow along while looking at the stunning images from ancient Haggadot on the Congregation Emanu-El site [www.emanuelnyc.org/seder/table.html].

There are a few Web sites where you take a look at pages from ancient Haggadot. The beautiful Sasoon Spanish Haggadah dates back to before the Expulsion of Jews from Spain in 1492 and is written on parchment [www.imj.org.il/judaica/sasoon.htm]. Yale University Library has put together a beautiful online exhibit of ancient and modern Haggadot including the 13th-century Birds Head Haggadah [www.library.yale.edu/judaica/exhibits/haggadah/]. Karen Roeckard has written an interested essay on the evolution of the Haggadah [www.santacruzhag.com/evolution.html]. In the 17th century, there were approximately 37 printed Haggadot and over 3,000 versions today.

One more deserves mention. Many people have fond memories of the Maxwell House Passover Haggadah. According to KosherTodayOnline, Maxwell House (now part of Kraft Foods) has distributed 35 million copies of its blue and white Haggadah since the 1930s. An article on the Temple Reyim of Newton, Mass. Web site says we owe a great deal to the Maxwell House Haggadah [www.reyim.org/bulletin/2000/april.shtml]: "As a product of the Great Depression, it reminds us of some of the hardships we faced as an American Jewish community struggling to survive difficult economic times. If it were not for the generosity of Maxwell House, many families during the '30s and '40s would not have had Haggadot. This classic should be part of every synagogue library." A Haggadah that's good to the last song.

Of rich fruits and characters

The Family Orchard*, by Nomi Eve, Random House, $36.95.

This impressive debut novel brings to life a long and involved family history, combining dreams and reality, legend and fact.

The author who narrates this two hundred year saga begins with her great-great-great-grandparents who left Eastern Europe as a young couple in the mid-1800s to settle in Jerusalem. From this first pair – seductive and unfaithful Esther and pious, strait-laced Yochanan – stem five generations of colourful, lively, eccentric characters whose lives are filled with incident and drama in Europe, America and the Holy Land.

Eve uses an original dual method of presentation. Under the heading My Father Writes, the reader is furnished with concise biographical summaries of the book's personae that relate to the more complex and vibrant narrative.

A rich parade of characters marches across diverse eras of Jewish history. Among them is Avra, the kleptomaniac, and her husband, Simon, a fruit farmer, who settle in Petach Tikvah, the citrus-growing centre of the Jewish settlement. Their twin sons, Zohar and Moshe, grow up during the days of Arab-Jewish tension and suffer contrasting fates in the 1940s when they defy the British blockade and engage in illegal Jewish immigration.

Eliezer, Zohar's son, tries to conjure up a golem in his father's garden. He tries "shutting his eyes and whispering any one of a number of secret incantations that he imagined would do the trick. He walked the seven circles, though. This was easy enough. And as he walked he bid fire and water and earth and air to come forth and animate his creation. But this time, like all the other times, nothing happened. And Eliezer was disappointed that no golem rose up to keep him company, save the village, or do odd jobs."

The author's poetic style is evident throughout, as in her description of Zohar always associating the birth of his third child with ashes: "The ashes because the year the baby was born, there was a premature frost accompanied by a severe hailstorm that ruined most of the crops on the trees. That spring, the village burned an entire season of ruined fruit. While the burning was in progress a thin film of citrus ash hovered over all the houses and seemed to coat everything in gray but sweet, almost caramelized, carapace. The amber-coloured ash settled on the porches and branches and windowsills like a death you could eat like candy."

The novel's many characters and their families are diagrammed every few chapters in an elaborate family tree. There are echoes in the book of Sholom Aleichem and Isaac Bashevis Singer. Gabriel Garcia Marquez also comes to mind as the author turns, from time to time, to the realm of magic realism.

A concluding chapter offers a manual of orchard terms that deal largely with the grafting process, firstly, because so much of the book's setting is around an orchard and secondly, because the novel, in effect, splices and blends disparate stories into a neat and cohesive whole.

Lending interest to the text is a series of illustrations that are taken largely from 19th-century travel narratives. This is a superior novel, at once epic and intimate, from a storyteller of beguiling power.

New model of care introduced for those with dementias

By LEILA SPEISMAN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — A new model of care for those with Alzheimer's disease and other dementias is expected to open later this spring in the Bathurst Manor district of Downsview.

The residence, called 147 Elder Street, is meant to provide "a resident-centred home environment, in the heart of the Jewish community, near two synagogues, a plaza and a park," according to director Roslyn Schultz.

The facility is being built and will be operated by SageCare, which offers consulting services and programs for the elderly, particularly to those who need complex continuing care and long-term care, their mission statement says.

Schultz has worked as a psychiatric social worker, psychotherapist, senior facilities planner and environmental design consultant. She told The CJN that 147 Elder Street is based on a model that she discovered in Tasmania, which calls for people with Alzheimer's to live in "a small, homelike environment with a small skilled staff, in an appropriate setting."

The philosophy of the home was arrived at after extensive research into the needs of those with dementias. Schultz said that she hopes it will be a model of its kind.

The philosophy is cueing, which Schultz describes, simply, as "shepherding people through the day." It also entails surrounding the residents with familiar things and experiences, and trying to maintain a calm, relaxed atmosphere.

This will, it is hoped, reduce the level of agitation, as well as the level of agitated behaviours.

So, for example, the living room has sofas, a fireplace, and bookcases, the dining room has a chandelier ("because dining rooms have chandeliers," Schultz pointed out), and the family room has a piano and a television.

While there is a cook, if the residents can participate, or even just be in the kitchen while food is being prepared, that will stimulate their appetites, "another example of cueing," Schultz said.

Similarly, they can eat in the kitchen, family room or dining room – wherever they are most comfortable.

They can start their day any time between six and ten in the morning, according to the schedule they were used to.

Those with dementias, Schultz said, are uncomfortable in formal situations, such as a synagogue service or a concert, where they are forced to sit for relatively lengthy periods of time, among large groups of people. Such situations can lead to discomfort as well as to extreme agitation, which can result in uncontrolled behaviour and a correspondingly increased use of sedatives.

On the other hand, she said, familiar situations, such as going to synagogue, helps keep people oriented and comfortable.

The way to deal with this problem, Schultz suggested, is by going to the synagogue during the week rather than on Shabbat, and listening to music, if that has been part of their life, in the residence itself.

While a calm, relaxed atmosphere, and familiar activities and experiences are important, so too are safety and security. Water temperature is controlled; burners are hidden; furniture is arranged around the walls, rather than in the middle of the room; the garden, which can be accessed without having to use steps, will have only edible flowers.

When people come to live at 147 Elder Street, life-story books will be created for them with pictures, memories and background information. Prepared with the help of the family, Schultz said, the books will show "what is precious to them – what they enjoyed in the past and in the present."

She calls the facility a "therapeutic community – whoever comes in is part of that community." This includes family, she stressed, who will be encouraged to visit and spend time in whatever room they feel most comfortable in.

One of the most important elements of this kind of residence is having a well-trained, supportive and alert staff, who should be able to interact with the residents in a respectful and effective way, and able to detect changes in levels of functioning.

While 147 Elder Street will be partially subsidized by SageCare, the hope is to eventually have a series of these homes.

"We want to be able to go to the government, and say that this is an appropriate alternative [to long-term care institutions]," Schultz said.

"Working with the [very elderly] is very new for everyone. We are all exploring how to make these years worthwhile. It is very exciting."

For more information, call SageCare at 416-250-8965 or e-mail them at sagecare@on.aibn.com.

Why we're in Israel now.

Photographed atop Masada (in the world's oldest functioning synagogue), March 18, 2001

"We came to Israel to celebrate our son's Bar Mitzvah. We knew it would be an unforgettable experience for the whole family. But considering all that is happening right now, this trip will mean a great deal more.

"In the days before the ceremony, we toured the holiest sites in Jerusalem. We saw the Dead Sea Scrolls, we walked through the Old City. Everything reminded us why it's so important to show our support now.

"When you're here, you see an Israel you don't see on the evening news. The shops and cafés in Jerusalem are filled with people. And everyone is so friendly and happy to see us.

"We could have had our son's Bar Mitzvah back home. But it would never be as meaningful. Especially now. You have to be here to feel the people's faith, and their passionate commitment to peace, and to this land.

"We want to give our children an experience that will stay with them for a lifetime. We can think of no better way than showing them Israel now."

Peace not possible with Arafat: ZOA head

By RON CSILLAG
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Is peace possible between Israel and the Arabs? Not for the foreseeable future, says an American Jewish leader.

Peace won't happen during the leadership of Yasser Arafat, according to Morton Klein, president of the Zionist Organization of America (ZOA).

But the problem, Klein told a small audience last week at Chabad Lubavitch of Markham, isn't just with Arafat. It's with his entire "corrupt, terrorist dictatorship."

The Palestinian leader has failed to live up to all four "legs" of the 1993 Oslo peace accords and even continues to flout all the treaty's provisions, said Klein, whose opinions are often quoted by major media outlets.

Arafat has not curbed terror attacks against Jews, has not recognized Israel's right to exist, has not respected human rights and has not put an end to anti-Semitic propaganda, Klein charged.

Since the signing of the Oslo accords on the White House lawn, some 500 Jews have been murdered in Israel and the territories, he noted. Weapons are routinely smuggled into the Palestinian areas through a warren of tunnels linking Egypt with the Gaza Strip. And Arafat has even named streets and public squares after suicide bombers.

"He doesn't outlaw terror, he promotes it," Klein said.

The PLO covenant still calls for Israel's destruction, he noted. Klein displayed a Palestinian tourist map, funded in part by the United Nations, that makes no mention of Israel. Neither do textbooks used in Palestinian schools, he said.

As for respecting human rights, Klein quoted an Amnesty International study that found between 50 and 90 percent of prisoners in Palestinian jails are tortured.

The ZOA, he said, has studied 140 Palestinian textbooks, and found multiple passages saying Jews are evil and equating Zionism with Nazism.

Holocaust denial too is "replete throughout Palestinian society."

Arafat "has created a culture of murder and hatred no different from Germany in the 1930s. They consider us vermin."

The Oslo accord and peace settlements following it have "failed on all counts. The evidence requires us to believe that Arafat has no desire for peace."

Israel's concessions have only "emboldened" Palestinians. "Unilateral concessions always fail."

Klein praised new Israeli Prime Minister Ariel Sharon as a "strong man of great character." Sharon can reduce violence and terror by standing tough against Palestinians. War under the leader, Klein feels, will be "less likely."

Klein had lukewarm words for the new American administration, saying that President George W. Bush is much less interested in Mideast peace than was Bill Clinton, who "threatened" Israel with sanctions unless it ceded more land for peace.

Kashruth Council releases directories

The Kashruth Council of Canada, affiliated with Vaad Harabonim of Toronto and Jewish Federation of Greater Toronto, recently published two 2001-5761 Kashruth Directories – one for the retail consumer and one for the commercial/industrial sector.

Cynthia Gasner, editor of the directories, says that there has been a tremendous growth of products and services under COR supervision and certification.

"What began some 40 years ago as a four-page informational pamphlet has now expanded to a 76-page listing for retail consumers, and a larger 80-page edition for those who produce kosher products or provide a variety of services for the community."

There are ongoing changes in the food industry and it is a tremendous task to keep the directories current, she says. "With computerized systems, we are able to keep abreast of the changes and issue updates throughout the year."

Along with hundreds of products, the directories also include hotels, bakeries, butcher shops, fish markets, restaurants, take-out services, catering establishments, public institutions, kosher food stores, novelty stores, summer camps, day care centres, resorts and conference centres, information on the dietary laws, and other kashrut-related facts.

The Rabbinical Vaad Hakashruth, headed by Rabbi Yitzchok Kerzner, employs more than 70 mashgichim (kashruth inspectors) and 9 staff members.

Marvin Sigler, chair of the Kashruth Council says, "We are very pleased to be able to provide an ever-increasing number of kosher products and facilities under COR supervision available both for the kosher consumer and food producer."

Executive director Rabbi Mordechai Levin says that the directories are part of an ongoing educational and information program carried on by the kosher information department of the Council which provides a service to communities across Canada and beyond.

He notes that throughout the year the council sends out holiday information, updates, and other relevant information, These are distributed without charge to those on COR's mailing list. To be placed on the mailing list or to get kashrut information, call 416-635-9550 or write to the Kashruth Council of Canada, 4600 Bathurst St., Suite 240, Toronto, Ont., M2R 3V2.

"Why do you exercise so long, Bubby?"

My granddaughter Annie knows I have Parkinson's. She is three years old and naturally curious. I tell her that I exercise to be as strong and flexible as I can possibly be.

Annie likes to do the exercises with me. "Reach for me, Bubby!" she will say in a very determined voice, stretching her little hand out to mine.

I love my Annie. She and her brother Max are my inspiration.

Baycrest's Parkinson's Early Intervention Program taught me the axial mobility exercises I do today. I've learned so many important skills to help me manage my condition. The program has really altered my life.

My grandchildren and I have lots to do. I have to be strong.

Thanks, Baycrest.

Israel-Jordan ties said 'cooled off' since peace deal

King Abdullah II committed to peace

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Israel's bilateral relations with the Hashemite Kingdom of Jordan have cooled off in the past two years, an Israeli scholar says.

The "public profile" of Israel's relationship with Jordan has declined since King Hussein's death in 1999 and his son Abdullah II's accession to the throne, Asher Susser said in a recent interview.

One of Israel's foremost authorities on contemporary Jordan, he warned that this decline, in the eyes of Jordanians, is eroding the legitimacy of Jordan's 1994 peace treaty with Israel and strengthening Arab nationalist and Islamic forces in Jordan opposed to normalization.

A senior fellow at the Moshe Dayan Center for Middle Eastern Studies at Tel Aviv University, Susser said that the kind of "personal chemistry" that King Hussein enjoyed with Yitzhak Rabin, the late Israeli prime minister, simply no longer exists.

None of Rabin's successors, from Shimon Peres to Benjamin Netanyahu, succeeded in building a similarly warm friendship with King Hussein.

Susser, the author of several books about Jordan, cannot envisage an improvement of Israeli-Jordanian relations as long as the current Palestinian uprising in the West Bank and the Gaza Strip continues.

For now, therefore, King Abdullah II has no intention of sending Jordan's newly-appointed ambassador to his post in Tel Aviv.

"The level of representation affects the level of warmth in relations," said Susser, whose books include On Both Banks of the Jordan and The Hashemites in the Modern Arab World.

Nevertheless, he added, King Abdullah II is as committed to the peace treaty as his father, who signed and campaigned tirelessly for it.

"No one in the regime seriously thinks of undermining it," Susser said.

But the king's public coolness to Israel only encourages Jordanians fighting to downgrade Jordan's relations with Israel. As Susser put it: "It adds fuel to anti-normalization efforts."

In his estimation, there is significant opposition to normalization in Jordan, spearheaded by professional syndicates and intellectuals.

Jordan recently cracked down on the anti-normalization front after it published a blacklist of Jordanians dealing with Israel.

"This non-governmental group was taking control of the public agenda, and this Jordan could not tolerate," Susser explained.

Jordanian intellectuals are anti-Israel because they regard themselves as guardians of Arab/Islamic identity in the face of Western encroachments into the region. Israel, he said, is regarded as a Western country.

In his view, Jordan has not reaped the benefits of peace. The Jordanians believed that the peace treaty would solve their economic problems, but in fact this has not occurred. "Since there has been no peace dividend, there is a great sense of disappointment from the top down," Susser said.

Part of the problem stems from Israel's desire to restrict Jordanian commerce with the West Bank, Jordan's natural market.

"Israel is very reluctant to allow Jordan a foothold in the West Bank's economy. But it's in Israel's interest to let Jordan trade in the West Bank. This is a short-sighted Israeli policy."

Partly as a result of Israel's stance, Jordan is rebuilding its heretofore mutually profitable economic links with Iraq, he disclosed.

In addition, Jordan is somewhat wary of Israel's new prime minister, Ariel Sharon.

"He still has a very negative image in Jordan, but the Jordanian elite is prepared to judge him by his actions.

"It's not exactly clear what he stands for. Sharon is remembered as the prime exponent of the Jordan-is-Palestine theory."

This position, he said, prompted Jordan to come out in favour of an independent Palestinian state in the West Bank and Gaza.

Jordan wants to be compensated billions of dollars for having absorbed numerous Palestinian refugees, he said.

"It's probably a realistic expectation. The international community would probably be prepared to put up a lot of money."

Asher Susser

Jordan also seeks the resettlement, in a new Palestinian state, of some 500,000 Palestinian refugees displaced by the 1967 Six Day War.

Susser said that Israel's security co-operation with Jordan has recovered from the 1997 Mashaal affair, triggered by the Mossad's failed attempt to assassinate a senior Hamas official in Amman.

On the most basic level, security co-operation takes the form of keeping the border quiet.

Given present realities in the Middle East, he does not expect Israel and Jordan to engage in joint military exercises.

However, Israeli arms sales to Jordan remain a possibility. "If it happens, these transactions would not be publicized."

Susser was in Toronto recently at the invitation of York University's Centre for International and Security Studies.

In Hamilton, for example, the group was queried about the Palestinian right of return, which got a few of the kids upset.

At a certain point, Rabbi Kandler said, they didn't respond maturely. But then they recovered and answered the questions.

"These students don't all have one political vision. Within Yehudah and Shomron, there are many different opinions and people relate to the peace process on different levels and angles."

However, over the past six months, Rabbi Kandler has noticed a significant shift in the way settlers are viewed here and in Israel.

"I'm not saying that everyone agrees with us, but they're willing to meet and talk. Now, there is dialogue between the left and the right."

But, the goal of this trip was not to teach the kids how to deal with difficult questions, Rabbi Kandler said. "They deal with it enough in Israel – the left wing supplies them with enough of these challenges.

"The goal was for them to feel the support and warmth of this community. That was what we were looking for, and that is what we gained."

Mutual respect the key to 65 years of marriage

By CYNTHIA GASNER
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — After 65 years of marriage, Fred Isaac says, "I am the luckiest man on earth to be married to Ruth."

Their daughter Esther Isaac says the success of her parents' marriage hinges on the mutual respect they have for each other.

"They are also best friends who do what best friends do, namely, support, encourage and communicate honestly."

In an interview in their midtown home where their walls are covered with paintings created by the energetic and talented couple, Ruth, 84, and Fred, 88, spoke of their early years, the essence of their marriage and their many blessings despite their difficult teen years in Germany.

Over tea and sweets served by Fred and baked by Ruth, they spoke of their three children, Ari, a piano rebuilder who owns A. Isaac's Pianos where he manufactures hammers and strings; John, a Spanish and French teacher in Vancouver; and Esther, an English teacher. And they are proud to show guests pictures of their three grandchildren and a great-grandchild.

Ruth and Fred were born in Germany and met at a school set up to prepare young people for immigration to Palestine. Ruth's roommate introduced her to her brother, who was visiting. Fred says that after one hour of conversation with Ruth, he told his sister that one day he would marry Ruth.

In 1934, after being removed by law from medical school, Fred left Nazi Germany for Palestine. After a year of correspondence, Ruth followed.

Jokingly, she says, "We married the following year because my visitors' visa was going to expire." They farmed there for 17 years.

In 1957, the Isaacs family came to Canada. Ruth worked for the Bureau of Jewish Education (later the Board of Jewish Education), and Fred established several businesses including a janitorial service.

To celebrate their 65th anniversary, friends and family from across Canada and the United States gathered at the Beth Tzedec Synagogue to express their love and admiration for the young-at-heart couple who were leaving on a cruise to mark the occasion.

When Esther went to buy 65th wedding anniversary balloons for the anniversary party, the sales clerk said, "Wow, we only carry balloons up to the 60th anniversary." Nevertheless, the party was a great success.

Fred and Ruth Isaac

"Although my parents are different in temperament – my mother is quick and practical, rooted in the here and now, whereas my dad is sensitive, spiritual and demonstrative – they share many interests and talents and their insatiable appetite for knowledge hasn't dimmed with the years," Esther says.

"It's rare to see them simply being. More often than not they're doing. They love to travel, love music, take in lectures and are voracious readers."

Fred is an avid gardener, Ruth makes jewelry and they are both open to trying many things.

"You don't know what you can do until you try," Fred notes.

Asked what makes a good marriage, Ruth says, "Give and take – be prepared to give more than you take – talk things out and come to a compromise. Have similar interests and always put your spouse before anything else."

Fred is quick to say that they have many friends but adds, "We are the happiest when there are only the two of us; we are never bored."

As for the future, Fred is completing his biography, both are becoming computer literate and they plan to take more courses.

"We are fortunate to be able to be healthy, and grateful that we can do so many things together," Fred says.

"My parents model what marriage should be and for that my husband and I thank them despite the fact they're a hard act to follow," their daughter says.

Lilli Toporek, Israeli Fashion Designer: A Warm Woman and Loving Mother

Lilli Toporek nee Borgenicht was born in Leipzig, Germany in 1923 and died suddenly in Toronto. With each passing day I miss her more and more and spend many hours reflecting on the positive accolades of her life as a career woman and mother.

In Germany, she attended Hebrew School. She came to Israel via Italy with the Youth Aliyah. Lilli entered the Mizrachi School in Jerusalem where she studied design. In Israel she worked with two leading European fashion designers. It did not take long for people to notice her individual talent and drive.

Lilli met my father Yanek and they married in 1946. With her passion and my father's skills as a textile engineer from Leeds University, they founded a successful company 'JADOLI"; 'JA' stands for my Dad, Jaacov, 'DO' for my name Dorit and 'LI' for Lilli.

Together they brought JADOLI, a manufacturing company of leather and woolen coats into the top ranks of high fashion houses of Israel.

In 1965 Jadoli was awarded the outstanding Exporter award by the Israeli government. They won many other numerous awards, and my mother was praised and quoted in various Designers' Biographies (i.e. Newman Marcus).

Lilli had a flare for intricate designs and was chosen to design clothing for Golda Meir and LadyBird Johnson. She also designed the first uniform for El Al Airlines. Her collection of lines were sold and seen all over the world.

This was only one side of Lilli, a successful businesswoman. The other side was that of a wonderful and nurturing mother.

My parents retired in Toronto in 1984. As an only child I have to say I feel like the luckiest person in the world. My mother had a tremendous influence on my life and the lives of her three loving grandchildren Nathalie, Daniel and Shira.

Mom, your vivacious open-minded personality has been an inspiration. Your fun loving youthful spirit was uplifting to all. I can't touch you but I can feel you all around me. I know you watch over us like only a mother can. You bring a smile to my face and a tear to my eye with each day that passes. You will be in my heart forever.

Haifa Foundation, Mount Sinai to honour Dr. Noyek

By CYNTHIA GASNER
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — Haifa Foundation (Canada) and Mount Sinai Hospital Foundation's Peter A. Silverman Centre for International Health are honouring Dr. Arnold Noyek, otolaryngologist-in-chief at Mount Sinai.

Noyek, who was born in Dublin, Ireland, graduated from University of Toronto and trained in New York City. He is a professor at U of T, and a consultant with the Baycrest Centre of Geriatric Care.

As well, he chairs the Isabel Silverman Canada International Scientific Exchange Program (CISEPO), where for six years he has tried to advance medical and scientific Israeli-Arab cross-border collaboration.

The mission of the Haifa Foundation is to advance educational, cultural, communal and environmental projects.

It also seeks to improve the quality of life for new immigrants from such countries as the former Soviet Union and Ethiopia, as well as Christians, Muslims, Druze, Bahai's, and Ahmedians who live among the longtime residents in the area.

Leaders in the medical, academic, legal, business, and government worlds will join friends and family for the Bridging the Silence tribute dinner for Noyek on April 2 at Le Parc Conference and Banquet Centre in Thornhill.

Art Eggleton, minister of national defence is the honorary chair of the event. Special guest will be Amram Mitzna, mayor of Haifa. Toby Feldberg, chair of Haifa Foundation will serve as dinner chair.

Feldberg said it is "appropriate for Arnold to receive this honour from Haifa Foundation because he has dedicated his life to bridge the gap between the multicultural communities. We are delighted that he accepted this well deserved tribute."

Dr. Arnold Noyek

Noyak said "the dinner is an exciting opportunity for us to apply our cross-border experiences in building bridges of understanding and co-operation which are now being applied to another challenge – bridging communities in the north of Israel.

"The concept for the Haifa project jumped out at us. At the health sector level, a collaborative team is already in place."

He said that in Canada, the Mount Sinai Hospital, U of T and the new Peter A. Silverman Centre for International Health, along with a network of individuals and institutions in northern Israel, are already working together for deaf children across cultures.

A deaf child unrecognized and unrehabilitated beyond the first two years of life will never catch up and have the same educational, social and job opportunities as a hearing child, he said.

"This will have an impact for the child, the family and society."

Joseph Mapa, president and CEO, Mount Sinai Hospital, recently announced the appointment of Noyek as the founding director of the Peter A. Silverman Centre for International Health, "an initiative directly attributed to his vision and energy.

"Arnie is bigger than anyone realizes. He is a physician, professor, ambassador and humanist. He is a wonderful example of what can be achieved when you use your talents to the fullest capacity.

"He exemplifies how health care can bring together the common interests of diverse cultures and countries," he said.

"Because of families [intermarrying], hereditary hearing loss is a major problem in the Middle East. As well as rehabilitating deaf children from all cultural and religious backgrounds, the project will also assist audiologists, physicians, teachers and other community workers and all those who serve these needy children," said Mapa.

Since 1995, Noyek and CISEPO have involved Canadians, Israelis, Jordanians and Palestinians in the development and operation of health services education, research and training programs. In its initiatives at peacebuilding in the Middle East, the group persists in the face of an unstable working environment.

Noyek is a member of the national executive and the Ontario regional executive of Canadian Jewish Congress, and he serves as a member of the central cabinet for the League of Human Rights of B'nai Brith Canada.

TJC leader remembered as mentor

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — The man who was a driving force behind the Lipa Green Building died early last week at his Toronto home, after a lengthy battle with cancer. He was 82.

Obituary

Irwin Gold served from 1975 to 1984 as executive vice-president of Toronto Jewish Congress (TJC – a precursor of UJA FEDERATION, and at the time representing a merger of the United Jewish Welfare Fund and Canadian Jewish Congress, Ontario region). Gold was in fact the first to lead the merged entity, which separated into the federation and CJC, Ontario region, in the late 1980s.

He is also remembered as a mentor to younger Jewish professionals, including Steve Ain, now a consultant to UIA Federations Canada.

"Irwin was very well respected in the field throughout North America," said Ain, who succeeded Gold after his retirement in 1984. "He always had time for younger staff... He was a very nurturing kind of guy."

"His door was always open and his patience and simple honesty never failed to soothe and enlighten," said Milton Harris in a eulogy. A personal friend and the TJC president who hired Gold, Harris added that Gold developed a cadre of young professionals who eventually became top Jewish professionals in many large American Jewish communities.

Gold derived much satisfaction from mentoring, said his daughter Lisa. "He was a superb teacher in that he respected the individual, whether a child, an adult or a young adult... He thought before he spoke. He was quiet and reserved, but extremely warm. He was quiet enough that you didn't always feel his impact immediately, but over time you realized his wisdom."

Among his other attributes, she noted, her father was a voracious reader and an "incredible" card player.

A native of Toronto, Gold was the son of Harry and Fannie Gold (nee Rosnick), shopkeepers active in the Workmen's Circle, who had immigrated from Minsk in 1912. He graduated from Harbord Collegiate and received his BA from the University of Toronto before pursuing an MSW at the University of Pittsburgh. He met his wife Beverly, whom he married in June 1947, when she was a young social work student and he was her supervisor.

In 1943, he enlisted in the American army and served in the European campaign for two years, receiving a medal for his service. Harris recalled that Gold had several close encounters with death and told him many times that the years he lived since the war were a gift.

His career history in the Jewish community dates back to the late 1940s when he became assistant executive director of the Chicago JCC. He held senior positions in Jewish communities in Denver, San Francisco and Cleveland before returning to Toronto in 1975, and taught social work at a number of universities.

He is also remembered as a chair of the Council of Jewish Federations' (one of the original organizations now encompassed by United Jewish Communities) large cities executive committee, comprising the 16 largest Jewish communities in Canada and the United States.

In the years following his retirement, Gold served as a consultant for UJA FEDERATION of Greater Toronto and for Jewish communities internationally, largely in a fund-raising capacity and in terms of how to run the organizations, Lisa Gold said.

Gold had the "experience of where the community had been" and and the vision to take it where it was going, said Alan Reitzes, UJA FEDERATION's executive director, who was hired by Gold in 1982.

His contribution to the organized Jewish community was inestimable, Harris said.

Gold is survived by his wife Beverly; children Donna Rothstein of Westfield, N.J.; Larry Gold and Lisa Gold, both of whom live in Los Angeles; his brother Bertram of New York, who headed the American Jewish Committee; and six grandchildren.

Great rabbis series planned

TORONTO — Rabbis Shlomo Riskin, Jacob Schacter and Jonathan Sacks, prominent spokespeople for central Orthodoxy, will be appearing in Toronto this spring at Shaarei Shomayim Congregation's Great Rabbi Series.

The series, called The Challenge of Modernity: Three Great Rabbis Speak about Jews, Torah and Israel, will discuss Orthodoxy, Zionism and Jewish continuity.

Rabbi Riskin, chief rabbi of Efrat, and chancellor of Ohr Torah Stone Colleges and Graduate Programs, will appear from April 20 to April 22, when he will give several divrei Torah, a Shabbat afternoon lecture called Yom Hashoa and Yom Ha'atzmaut: What is the Message of the Calendar?, and a community lecture on Sunday night called The Holocaust and Zionism Today.

Rabbi Schacter, former rabbi of The Jewish Centre in New York City and now founding dean of the Rabbi Joseph B. Soloveitchik Institute in Boston, will present the Sam Kamin Community Lecture on May 3 on the topic Torah, Culture and Contemporary Orthodoxy.

He will also speak at Kabbalat Shabbat on Friday night, at Shacharit services on Shabbat, and on Shabbat afternoon, when he will discuss On the Morality of the Patriarchs: Must Biblical Figures Be Perfect?

Chief Rabbi of Great Britain and the Commonwealth Jonathan Sacks will be in Toronto from May 10 until May 12. He will give a community lecture on May 10, followed by divrei Torah at Kabalat Shabbat, and a major address at Shabbat services. He will also speak on Shabbat afternoon.

Rabbi Sacks' appearance is sponsored by the synagogue, Mizrachi Organization of Canada and the Jack Miller Endowment Fund.

During all three weekends there will be opportunities to meet and talk with the rabbis.

The Great Rabbis series is part of Shaarei Shomayim's Great Weekends program.

While most of the programs are free, there is a charge for the dinners and reservations are required.

Righteous Gentile is thankful God chose her

By RON CSILLAG
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Irene Gut Opdyke believes God put her "in the right place and the right time."

But it was a terrible place and time.

She was raped by advancing Russian troops and left to die, then forced to work in a Nazi munitions factory – all before turning 18.

She gave in to a terrible bargain and risked her life to save complete strangers in acts of heroism that leave a listener breathless. In the process, she was separated from her sisters for 30 years.

Yet, she still believes her life was guided by God, who gave her, she says, free will to help others.

The diminutive, white-haired 80-year-old, who lives in Orange County, Calif., says she is Jewish "in my heart... my neshuma is Jewish." But she is Catholic, and Righteous Among the Nations, an honour bestowed by the State of Israel through Yad Vashem on just 20,000 gentiles worldwide.

Opdyke was in Toronto last week to address local high school students, give a public lecture at Shaarei Shomayim Congregation and address Jewish community workers, whom she held spellbound in a noon-hour talk at the Lipa Green Building.

Her tangled journey took her from her home-town of Kozienice in Poland, to Radom. In 1941, the city was under Nazi control and the young nursing student was put to work making arms for the German war effort. One day, she fainted at her station. An SS major, Eduard Rugemer, took pity on the blonde, blue-eyed girl, and reassigned her as a waitress at a German mess hall.

The hall overlooked Radom's Jewish ghetto, where Opdyke witnessed daily atrocities, including seeing soldiers tear a baby from a mother's arms, toss it in the air and shoot it like a clay pigeon.

"I cried out, 'God, where are you?' But I realized He gave us free will, a choice," she said. She decided to act. She found a loose board in the ghetto's wall and began leaving food parcels, as well as snatches of information she overheard in the officers' mess.

Heroic acts, as she notes in her book In My Hands: Memoirs of a Holocaust Rescuer (whose soft-cover edition she was here to promote), often start with small steps.

Irene Gut Opdyke

Larger steps would come later. In 1942, the Nazis advanced eastward, and Opdyke found herself in Tarnopol (now in Ukraine), which had a prewar Jewish population of 18,000. There, her responsibilities included overseeing a laundry, where she discovered 12 Jewish slaves forced to wash Nazi uniforms.

She spirited six of them to a nearby forest, and when Rugemer later commandeered a villa, she took the rest to its basement, "right under the major's nose," she recalls. Their ranks soon grew to 12, including a pregnant woman. Opdyke insisted the baby be born, against the wishes of some of the others. Today, that baby is a successful businessman in Israel. All received smuggled food and clothes for over a year.

But one day, the major discovered the ruse. Certain death loomed for all. Instead, he struck a deal with Opdyke. He would not turn her in in exchange for sexual favours. "It was a small price to pay," she says in a small voice.

When she learned of the Jewish ghetto's impending destruction, she again took six of her charges to the forest and the rest to a gazebo in the villa's garden, just metres from where the major would host lavish dinner parties.

Just 200 Jews in Tarnopol survived the war, including those saved by Opdyke.

For the past 35 years, she has spent nearly half her time on the road, lecturing to students.

"I tell them, 'Don't hate. Hate does not accomplish anything.' We all belong to one human family." The students all line up for hugs, "even the biggest macho boys."

Courage, she says, "is a whisper from above."

She says she is "the richest person on earth. This is what I want to do for the rest of my life. I thank God for using me this way."

Opdyke's talks were sponsored by UIA Federations Canada and UJA FEDERATION of Greater Toronto.

York student volunteers on Otzma

By STACEY ORDON
Special to The CJN

I have just come back from one of my most memorable weekends in Israel this year. I had the opportunity to meet up with a Birthright Israel group from Toronto and spend their first Shabbat with them.

Sharing Shabbat with these first-timers made me aware of how lucky and grateful I am to be able to spend a year in Israel as part of Project Otzma, a volunteer program sponsored by UJA FEDERATION of Greater Toronto.

Otzma has two main goals: to develop young Jewish leaders, and to bridge the gap between the Diaspora and Israel.

This year Otzma was divided into four different tracks. For the first three months, we lived on a mercaz klita (absorption centre), where we attended an intensive Hebrew-language ulpan. We also taught English in an after-school program.

Track 2 consists of living and volunteering in our Partnership 2000 community. (Partnership 2000 is a worldwide UJA Federation initiative involving Israelis and Diaspora Jewry.)

I taught English in elementary and high schools in Eilat, and worked with troubled youth in a program for kids on the verge of failing at school. I also helped restore and re-open Eilat's Holocaust centre, worked as a big sister at a home for children who were removed from their families, and took the initiative to help out in dance classes at the community centre built by Toronto.

Also as part of track 2, we designed and painted murals around the city, with the theme of bridging the Israel-Diaspora gap. This track was the most meaningful to me because I had the opportunity to develop a bond with people in the community. Eilat was very welcoming and highly appreciative of the work we did. The people really made us feel that we were a part of the city.

The third track, the elective track, is where all 80 participants have the opportunity to choose a program in which to participate for three weeks. I chose Isralight, which involves spiritual and educational approaches to learning about Judaism. Other options included Sarel (army), Maalot (living in an Arab-Israeli village), Pardes (a yeshiva-type program), and Keren Kayemeth L'Israel (JNF).

Following this, the whole group does GADNA, a week-long Israeli Defence Force Training program for foreign students.

Stacey Ordon, right, and fellow Otzma participants present a painting to Eilat Mayor Gabi Kadosh.

The final track of the program takes place on either a kibbutz or in a kfar noar (youth village). I am hoping to be placed on a youth village in the north.

Project Otzma provides its participants with amazing opportunities. We have the chance to hear some of Israel's most respected speakers discuss issues we are studying. We are based in different parts of Israel throughout the year, which enables us to get a better feel for the country. The program also provides every participant with an adoptive family.

I clearly remember my first day on Otzma, when our staff explained how this could be the year a peace treaty is signed, there could be an election while we are here, or this would be the year that some of us made aliyah.

Well, there has been an election, some have made aliyah and others will, but a peace treaty has yet to be signed. The violence is an issue that has been on everyone's mind.

Most of our parents have been worried because of what they see on the evening news. However, if the situation here was as bad as the news made it out to be, I think many of us would have gone home.

There is no doubt that certain parts of the country are dangerous. The Otzma participants are given clear boundaries as to where we should and should not go.

It might be hard to understand, but when you live here, although the violence is an issue, you don't let it stop you from living your life.

Project Otzma so far has let me have a fun and fulfilling year. It has opened my eyes and made me even more appreciative of Israel and what it means to be Jewish.

Stacey Ordon, 24, is a York University student currently in Israel.

Manning will still have his day

Scene in Ottawa

By G.K. SIMCOE

It's funny the way political memory works. Except in the case of personal grudges – which can be remembered for years and decades – it seems that only short-term memory counts. As everyone lines up to lament, delight in or otherwise comment on Preston Manning's decision to withdraw from active political life, we seem to have forgotten what virtually every political commentator predicted in the immediate aftermath of his Canadian Alliance (CA) leadership loss to Stock Day.

"For form's sake", they all said, "Manning will serve for awhile in some senior advisory capacity within the new CA caucus, but will shortly thereafter leave politics – at least for a while".

So why all the surprise at his announcement? He's only following the script that they wrote for him barely 12 months ago!

Let's concede that Manning's departure from the Ottawa scene is significant, even if it was predictable. However, it would be imprudent to assume that his will be anything but a temporary absence. Although pundits and supporters alike are heaping all sorts of laudatory phrases on the guy, make no mistake about it: Manning remains one of the shrewdest, most calculating politicians who has ever appeared in Hansard. Always thinking two steps in front of the rest of the pack, Manning has positioned himself to become what Joe Clark always aspired to be but never will, the saviour of the right.

Day and his ardent supporters within the Alliance are becoming increasingly isolated. Clark's shrill self-righteousness in the House has reminded core CA supporters of the reasons they gave up on the idea of a Tory resurrection in the first (and last) place!

In a climate that is growing ever more uncomfortable with the idea of an indefinite Liberal hammer lock on power and is worried about the economic forecast for the country, Manning will be well placed to step forward as the once and future visionary.

All of this is to say that Jews have a new opportunity to make meaningful inroads in the conservative competition with the reigning Liberals. There is now a chance to reach out to Preston Manning and share with him the community's approach to some of the existential issues of the day.

At the very least, such efforts will demonstrate a willingness to engage in serious policy discussion, even in the absence of an immediate "payback." At most, it may help shape some of the new ideas Manning will be developing over the next couple of years as he waits for his "Day."

Sault Ste. Marie: Now and then

By ANNA MORGAN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Travelling from Buenos Aires, Argentina to Sault Ste. Marie, Ont. may seem like a long way to go to celebrate a family bar mitzvah.

However, when Roberto Demner was sent to the Sault to lead a work-related project at Algoma Steel, he decided to take his family with him and celebrate his son's bar mitzvah at the Beth Jacob synagogue.

Initially, Roberto came by himself in September to lead a project related to the manufacturing of steel pipes.

"When the High Holy Days arrived and I wanted to go to synagogue, I discovered Beth Jacob," Roberto said in an interview.

"I liked the effort that [lay leader] Jeff Arbus made to maintain Jewish traditions in this small community as well as the warmth the congregation extended towards visitors.

"In December, I went back to Argentina. When I came back to the Sault again in January, I decided to bring my family. Since Nicolas turned 13 on Feb. 1, we decided to prepare for his bar mitzvah in Canada."

Jeff, who teaches in the School of Human Services at Sault College, said that Nicolas didn't know very much Hebrew when he first arrived. But he prepared for six weeks with Carol Line, the bar mitzvah teacher, and was able to sing the maftir and recite the blessings in Hebrew for the occasion. Nicolas also put t'fillin on Sunday morning.

"His younger sister, Stephanie, also managed to pick up some of the blessings just by being around him.

"Nicolas is a bright and sociable boy," Jeff said. "He was fun to be around and interested in everything we do here."

Nicolas' father, Roberto, grew up in Argentina where he attended a Jewish school and was educated in Jewish tradition.

Recently, he noted, as in the rest of the world, Argentina has been affected by acts of anti-Semitism.

In 1992, the Israeli embassy was bombed in Buenos Aires and in 1994, the Jewish Community Social Agency (AMIA) was bombed. Eighty-six people died.

"In the first case, no one was charged. But in the second case, various people belonging to the Buenos Aires provincial police were arrested and are still in jail in connection with that crime," Roberto said.

"Both cases are still blurred and we don't really know exactly who was responsible. There are no convicted people.

"After these things happened, all the Jewish schools were granted the protection of the border security corps. Thick pieces of steel pipes filled with concrete were installed to protect the entrances of every single Jewish place.

"The AMIA building was rebuilt and it now resembles a bunker."

Altogether, Roberto noted, "There is a feeling of insecurity that has evolved – it is difficult to avoid for Jews and non-Jews.

"My family and I... don't participate in the organs of the community in Argentina. We only want to live and work in peace.

"We don't regret having made the decision to have Nicolas' bar mitzvah in the Sault. The community here was very encouraging and helpful. They treated us as if we were at home."

"For our community, it was a very special event. It meant a lot for us to be able to come together and support Nicolas and his family," Jeff Arbus said.

"This is what Jewish communal life is all about."

The Jewish community probably began in Sault Ste. Marie in 1902 when Ben Cohen arrived from Trois Rivieres, Que. to begin a scrap metal business.

Ben heard that Algoma Steel was opening up and realized there was financial opportunity, Bob Cohen, his grandson said in an interview.

"The story goes that he brought his wife here on their honeymoon, but I'm not sure about that," Bob said.

While five of Ben's 11 children stayed on in the Sault (including Bob's father, Jack), Bob noted that he was the only one who came back from his Hebrew school class.

"From here, all roads lead to Toronto."

For those who stay, the Jewish community in the Sault is very small and active, Bob said. "Everybody knows everybody else. The synagogue becomes a focus for all activities. You can't hide."

Murray Davis said that his father arrived in the Sault after World War I from Parry Sound, Ont.

At the beginning of World War I, there was a gunpowder plant in Parry Sound. When it closed after the war, his father moved to the Sault because he heard they were opening up a steel plant. He figured there would be business opportunities, Murray said. So, in 1919, he arrived in the Sault and went into the clothing business with a partner.

During the day, the Jewish merchants who were in the clothing business were as competitive as could be, but when the doors were closed, they were like brothers, Murray said.

"Amongst ourselves, we can act independently, but when [something involves] the whole community, we have to act together," he adds.

Ginny Cymbalist lives on the Michigan side of the Sault.

"Michigan and Ontario join together for services at the Beth Jacob Synagogue. For us there are no borders. It's all the Sault up here," said Cymbalist, who is a relative newcomer to the area.

"A few years ago, one of our Hebrew school classes did some interviews with the older members of our community," Ginny said. "We interviewed many other early members of the community, including Molly [Mintz] Feltham, Sharon Smith, Larry and Sam Kleinman, Helen Himmel and the Kates family.

"Morley Torgov's book A Good Place to Come From, is based on his childhood in Sault Ste. Marie and is a great read," Ginny said.

When the book first came out, "the old timers were furious. They all loved Morley, but many of them could see themselves in the book and swear they what he wrote was not accurate. They have all forgiven him long ago."

Ginny, whose husband Gil assisted Nicolas in his bar mitsvah, said it was wonderful the way the whole community came together to help in the bar mitzvah preparations and celebrations.

"Our community is very close," Ginny said. "Everyone feels like family. When one of us hurts, we all hurt."

Lore Cymbalist, 90, may be the newest Jewish immigrant – moving to the Sault in 1987 from Philadelphia, Pa. to be near her son and daughter in law. Since arriving, Lore works in an art gallery, is very active in Hadassah WIZO and does volunteer work for Jewish inmates at the prison nearby.

"We shmooze a little bit with them," Lore said.

"Lore is very active in the community," Ginny said. "She's incredible."

"Moving to Sault Ste. Marie was the best thing that ever happened to me," Lore said.

Check those ingredients on non-food items

As a service to the community, the Kashruth Council of Canada has circulated a request to drug firms and other related manufacturers asking them to provide a list of ingredients in their products.

All products ingested during Passover should have a "Kosher for Passover" endorsement. If "Kosher for Passover" products are not available and there is a medical need for any of the products, the items should be used in separate utensils.

We have not supervised the production of these products, but from the information received, there appears to be no chametz in these listed products.

General Guidelines:

Brown sugar and icing sugar should be used only with Passover supervision.

Cosmetics, toiletries, soap, topical medications, which are in solid form or are thick creams, ointments and salves, may be used (preferably without perfume). Please consult your Rabbi about wheat and oat based soaps.

The following items, which are not fit for human consumption (preferably unscented, when applicable) are permissible on Passover (excluding Sabbath and yom tov): nail polish, hand lotion, hand cream, cold cream, unscented baby lotion, baby cream, shampoo (without wheat), shoe polish, ink, paint, solid air freshener, nail polish remover, stick deodorants, eye shadow, eyeliner, mascara, blush and rouge, non-flavoured new lipsticks.

The following may contain chametz: Pet and fish food (i.e., hydrolyzed vegetable protein, starch, etc.), baby powder. The following are chametz: Play Dough and Postum.

Balloons and rubber gloves may have starches inside.

Plastic bags and wraps do not need kosher supervision when used for cold food.

Generally, when taking medication during Passover, preference should be given to non-chewable tablets rather than liquids and chewable tablets. Many products contain ingredients that are only permitted to be used on Passover for medical reasons. A competent rabbi who is familiar with the information upon which this flyer is based must be consulted prior to the use of these products. If there is any item that you must take during Passover and it is not found with reliable Passover supervision, please contact your rabbi, who may have additional information.

חברי שמחה שלח לי כמה בדיחות שחיקתי מת לסיור לכם, אבל שחיו נורמות לסגירת העיתון. אז אני נאלץ להסתפק רק בחלק מחמחגו שלוך.

מה זה מבהיל? משחו שחפסיק לנדול בשני חקצות ותחתיל לנדול באמצע.

מה זה בוסו משחו שחמיד מגיע מוקדם כשאחה בא מאוחר, או שחמיד נשאר מאוחר כשאחה יוצא מוקדם.

מה זה מלוץ המקום חעדיף שבו נידיעין הם לפני וחנחנה.

Galilean Memories: Passover in another place and time

By ANNA MORGAN
Staff Reporter

Passover is a time of storytelling. While the Haggadah tells of a shared Jewish experience, more personal tales of holidays spent with family are told in the kitchen. The following are some of the Passover memories recalled by my mother while preparing for the holiday.

In Safed, the capital of the Upper Galilee, preparations for Passover would begin soon after Purim. Furniture was moved out of the house, walls and ceilings were whitewashed, painted floors were scrubbed clean and fresh paint was brushed in between the tiles. Mattresses were taken out to the roof, and floors were left bare. Bedding was put out to air for a full day and beaten with a cane. Cupboards were emptied and thoroughly cleaned.

Two nights before the seder, the family – children and grandchildren – would all gather in Meir Abbo's home for the biyur chametz. Pieces of bread were placed in all corners of the house. Then Meir Abbo would take a feather in one hand and a candle in the other, and the bits of bread, which had been wrapped in newspaper, were swept into a dust pan.

The bundled bread was gathered on top of a small, charcoal-burning, clay stove and lay there waiting to be burned at around noon the day of the seder.

Only after the burning of the chametz was the shoichet called to come and slaughter the lamb – a gift from Meir Abbo's friends who lived in the Arab quarter of the city.

The Abbo family grew up in the Jewish quarter of Safed. Meir's father, Rabbi Ya'acov Chai Abbo was the French consul in Palestine, a position he inherited from his own father.

Before the turn of the century, Meir completed his studies in Beirut and then went on to military school in England, where he befriended the son of Queen Victoria, who later became King Edward VII. This friendship continued by correspondence for years afterwards.

In the Galilee, Meir's friends were many, including the Arab dignitaries who lived there. In his later years, Abu Rafael, as he was known by his friends, would spend hours with his Arab colleagues, drinking Turkish coffee, playing shesh besh games and discussing world politics. These were the '30s and '40s, before the creation of the State of Israel.

On the day of the seder, there was no time for shesh besh and no time for politics.

Weeks of preparation had gone into this day. Pots and pans had been carried – scrubbed and shining – to a special shop run by an Arab man who was at least 100 years old. He would sit in front of an open fire with a long pair of tongs and, one at a time, he would put the pots into the wood-burning fire where they would be scorched inside and out with fire and then filled with water. While the pots lay there, simmering with water, the old man would throw in red hot rocks and the water would sizzle and boil over.

When the fee was paid, the pots were carried back to the courtyard and set aside, ready to be used for cooking the food for the seder.

In the meantime, fittings for new Passover spring dresses would begin. Anxiously, the Abbo girls would wait to be taken to have their dresses tailored by the Arab seamstresses.

The smell of home-baked bread, roasted peanuts and watermelon seeds would fill the alleyways in the Arab quarter. Feasting on those treats was always an important part of the dress fittings.

The lunchtime meal before the seder was another important event – the last chametz meal before Passover. Rice and fava beans were left to soak in lamb fat until the flavour was absorbed. It was a special meal, reserved for that day only.

The rest of the day was spent by the women in the small makeshift kitchen that was used for Passover only. Rachael Abbo would work, red faced, flushed and perspiring, cooking and preparing – hands and eyes beckoning for this spice or that pot. The vegetables, bought fresh in the market, were set aside and washed.

At that time, there was no running water from taps. So the children fetched the water from rain-filled wells, dropping their buckets into the wells and carrying them to fill a big, brown barrel that hung on the wall of the Abbo house. A basin rested on a tripod underneath the barrel to catch any water that inadvertently escaped from the faucet at the bottom of the barrel.

After the hard work was done, just before the seder, the children would wait in line to bathe in Doda (Aunt) Golda's house, because she had a special tub. Hair ribbons and spring dresses had been dropped off earlier, ready to be put on. From there, the children would run excitedly to the courtyard of the House of Abbo, happily showing off their new clothes.

As the family gathered – grandparents, parents, aunts, uncles and cousins and guests– Meir would wait impatiently for the few that were always late. The rest would put the finishing touches on the seder table.

The delicious smells of the foods made it difficult to sit through the seder. Every once in a while, our giggles and chattering would be frozen into silence by one of Meir's piercing looks. He never said a word to us about our behaviour during the seder. His looks were loud and clear.

Towards the end of the seder, the door was opened for Eliyahu Hanavi and was left open so that any one could come in and join us. It was a part of Meir's dream to bring the poor and needy to his table.

After the seder was finished, everyone would stay together, listening to Abbo family stories until they finally fell asleep on mattresses that had been set aside on the floor.

Once Passover was over, the children would wait on their parents' balconies overlooking the narrow alleyways leading to the Abbo House.

Meir Abbo's friends would send large trays of food to be eaten after nightfall. When the Arab women, with round platters of food balanced on their heads, passed underneath the balconies, all the children would run down to follow them.

And then, with the whole family around, the Abbo family would share in the trays filled with Bedouin bread, olives, labane, za'atar, brown eggs, fresh vegetables, roasted watermelon seeds and Turkish delight.

"Le Shanah Haba'ah b'Yerushalayim [Next year in Jerusalem]," Meir Abbo would say.

"N'shallah [God willing]," the children would respond.

Passover Food Ideas

1,000 Jewish recipes – but who's counting?

By NORENE GILLETZ
Special to The CJN

I first met Faye Levy at a culinary conference a number of years ago. I am very tall and Faye is very short – but when it comes to our passion for Jewish food, we are definitely on the same level. We took a picture together – I crouched and she stretched!

Faye Levy is an award-winning cookbook author. When I learned that she had written 1,000 Jewish Recipes (IDG Books), I knew it would be a treasure before I even saw the book. I was absolutely right!

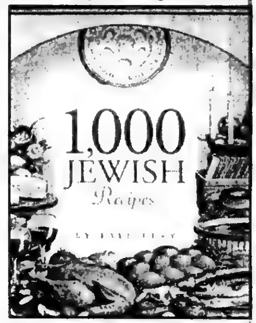
There are 1,000 wonderful recipes, ranging from traditional to trendy. She alternates between Sephardi and Ashkenazi cuisine, explaining the characteristics of each style of cooking.

Faye recommends planning a seder menu of dishes that can be prepared ahead. Before shopping and cooking, check the number of portions each recipe makes and multiply them according to your needs.

Since the first seder is on Saturday evening this year, Faye's mother's method for reheating roasted chicken is particularly useful.

Faye writes: "I often serve a whole roasted chicken for Friday night dinner. After the meal, I cut what is left into pieces, put it in a baking dish, cover it with foil, and refrigerate it. It's ready to be reheated. The oven stays on low all night, because it shouldn't be turned on during Shabbat.

"The next day, put the chicken in the oven. On low heat, it often takes an hour to reheat. Gently reheating the covered dish keeps it moist, though you can add a few tablespoons of chicken soup or water to the bottom of the pan. It's best not to reheat a whole chicken this way, as it would dry out. If there is a stuffing in the chicken, it must be removed before the bird is refrigerated, and stored and heated separately."



Different Jewish communities and families around the world have different recipes for charoset, an essential element of the seder plate. Ashkenazi charoset is a mixture of apples, walnuts and wine. Sephardi Jews tend to favour dried fruits, especially dates, which give charoset a rich texture and intense fruit taste. Popular nuts among Sephardi Jews are almonds and pine nuts. Jews from Iran add bananas.

When Faye Levy attended a seder in Paris, where most of the guests were of Moroccan origin, the charoset was served in little balls, rather like chocolate truffles.

Here are some simple and delicious recipes that Faye recommends for Passover.

CHAROSET TRUFFLES

8 oz. pitted dates
1/2 cup pecans
1/2 cup almonds about 3 tbsp. sweet red wine
1 tsp. ground cinnamon
1/2 tsp. ground ginger
1 sweet apple (e.g., golden delicious or gala), peeled and cored

Halve dates and remove any pits or pit fragments. Finely chop pecans and almonds in a food processor and remove to a bowl. Add dates, 3 tbsp. wine and spices to processor and grind until fairly smooth. Mix with nuts. Grate apples on large holes of a grater. Stir into date mixture. If mixture is dry, add more wine by teaspoons.

Roll charoset between your palms into small balls of about 3/4 or 1 in. diameter. Serve in foil or paper candy cups. Makes 10 to 12 servings of a few truffles each.

ROSEMARY ROAST CHICKEN

Rosemary gives this simple Italian-style roast chicken and its juices a wonderful aroma. Serve the chicken with a separately baked stuffing. If you like, arrange some halved new potatoes around the chicken in the pan so they absorb flavour from the roasting juices.

3 to 3 1/2 lb. chicken, rinsed, giblets removed 6 sprigs fresh rosemary, plus a few more for garnish
1 or 2 tbsp. extra-virgin olive oil salt (optional) and freshly ground pepper, to taste

Preheat oven to 400. Pull out fat from inside of chicken. Set chicken in a small roasting pan. Stuff chicken with 3 rosemary sprigs. Pour oil over chicken and sprinkle it with salt, if using, and with a little pepper. Rub oil and seasonings into chicken. Add 3 more rosemary sprigs to pan, tucking them under chicken.

Passover Food Ideas

1,0000 Jewish recipes

Roast chicken uncovered, basting once or twice, about 1 hour or until chicken juices run clear when thickest part of thigh is pierced with a thin knife or skewer. Remove cooked rosemary from chicken and from pan.

Carve chicken and put pieces on a platter. Garnish with fresh rosemary sprigs. Skim excess fat from roasting juices. Taste juices and adjust seasoning. When serving, spoon a little of the pan juices over chicken. Makes 4 servings.

FARFEL STUFFING WITH LEEKS AND CARROTS

Delicious with roasted chicken, lamb or veal. Also excellent as a side dish with fish or baked eggplant.

1½ cups hot vegetable stock
5 cups matzah farfel
2 tbsp. plus 2 tsp. vegetable oil
1 large or 2 medium leeks, rinsed and thinly sliced
salt and freshly ground pepper, to taste
2 large carrots, coarsely grated
2 large eggs, beaten
pinch of paprika

Preheat oven to 350. Lightly oil a 2-quart casserole dish. Set aside. Pour vegetable stock over farfel in a large bowl. Let stand to soften. Meanwhile, heat 2 tbsp. oil in a large skillet. Add leeks, salt and pepper and saute over medium heat, stirring often, for 5 minutes.

Cover and cook over low heat, stirring often, about 5 minutes or until tender. Remove from heat and stir in carrots. Add vegetable mixture to bowl of farfel and let cool. Taste and adjust seasoning. Stir in eggs.

Spoon stuffing into casserole dish. Sprinkle with remaining oil, then with paprika. Bake about 45 minutes or until firm. Makes 6 to 8 servings.

SAVORY CARROT KUGEL

You can also make this kugel with vegetable broth and serve it as a meatless dinner.

3 cups coarsely grated carrots
2 large eggs, beaten
½ cup minced onion
½ tsp. paprika, plus a little for sprinkling
½ tsp. dried dill
½ tsp. salt
¼ tsp. freshly ground pepper
2 tbsp. vegetable oil
1 cup chicken stock
1 tbsp. chopped fresh Italian parsley
⅔ cup matzah meal

Preheat oven to 350. Oil a 6-cup baking dish. Mix carrots with eggs, onion, paprika, dill, salt, pepper, oil, stock and parsley in a medium bowl. Stir in matzah meal. Pour mixture into prepared dish. Sprinkle with paprika. Bake for about 40 minutes or until firm. Serve hot. Makes 4 to 6 servings.

Latkes are for Passover also.

Sauté lamb bones and beef chuck to cook in their own juice – about 15 to 20 minutes – until there is enough juice to cover meat. Combine and add all above ingredients except for lemon juice and salt. Boil on gentle heat until wilted. Cover with boiling water and simmer for an hour. Add lemon juice, matzah balls and salt and let it simmer for another hour.

Bring to a boil to add matzah balls and simmer for 15 more minutes or until matzah balls are ready. Serves 30.

STUFFED GRAPE LEAVES

Note: This recipe contains rice for those who use it on Passover.

Leaves can be found in Middle Eastern specialty stores, some supermarkets or fresh from your own backyard. Fresh leaves need to be boiled for 15 minutes.

1 jar vine leaves (about 100 leaves in a jar) or 1 pound fresh
2 lb. ground beef
2-3 cups rice
9 to 13 cloves garlic sliced
4 tbsp. pareve margarine pinch of nutmeg pinch of cinnamon pinch of allspice pinch of cloves
salt and pepper to taste
juice of four lemons – more if you like it sour 4 tbsp. instant chicken soup.

Boil 4 to 6 cups of water. Add the instant soup, spices and margarine and half-cooked rice.

Stuffing: Fry ground beef and add spices. Combine meat and half cooked rice together.

Place one tbsp. of stuffing on each grape leaf. Fold bottom part first, tuck both sides in and roll to form a cigar-like shape.

Place in rows in a pot, add garlic between rows. Cover with boiling water and press down each row with small inverted saucers. Add lemon and spices to taste. Cover pan and let simmer for 45 minutes or until cooked.

Organization is the key to Passover preparations

By LEILA SPEISMAN
Staff Reporter

It's time, once again, to prepare for Passover. As usual, we groan about all the work, about how this year it crept up on us before we knew it, and about why we don't go away, at least for the seders.

There are tricks to getting through everything with your health, your family and your marriage intact. Here are some of my personal tactics.

First, and I can't stress this too strongly, make lists. Use your computer (here's one way kids can be a big help), use index cards or use notebooks. Make lists of what you have to do and when you want to do it; lists of what supplies you have to buy, remembering that you need a new potato peeler because last year yours got thrown in the trash; lists of who is coming when and if they have any special food requirements (I once had a guest who announced when he walked in that he couldn't eat any wheat product; another was a vegetarian); menus; shopping lists and recipes.

You may think you will remember everything, but believe me, when things get hectic (and they always do), you will certainly forget something basic.

Be organized about the cleaning. Begin with places that you are pretty sure will be chametz-free.

Get the kids to help, especially with their rooms. Younger children like to feel they are needed. Teenagers will be horrified at the idea that you would go through their drawers or closets.

Prepare a place to put the Pesach groceries and supplies until the kitchen is ready for them, as well as someplace to put the chametz that you remove from the food areas. Use up the food in the freezer and refrigerator, and as much chametz – bread, bread crumbs, flour, cornflake crumbs and cereals – as you can.

In the meantime, plan your menus. Remember, you have to think about meals other than the seders, as well as snacks. As you plan, make your shopping list, so you will be sure to have the ingredients you need. You won't be happy if you start making tzimmes and discover you didn't buy honey.

A good idea is to take an exploratory trip to wherever you plan to buy your Pesach groceries, just to see how they are laid out, what new products are on the shelf and whether things you liked last year and planned to use again are still around. That will make your actual shopping trip a little calmer.

Many kids like to come Pesach shopping with you. Take advantage of their enthusiasm. Just warn them that the nicest, most refined Dr. Jekyll-type person can, and usually does, transform into a Mr. Hyde, ready to shove the shopping cart into your back if you get in the way.

When you are finally ready to start cooking, stay focused, and work steadily, rather than hurriedly. If possible, try to work on several recipes at once. Chop the onions for the soup, kugel and ratatouille at one time, soak farfel for all the kugels at once, and spray several baking pans with cooking spray.

Unless you are an exceptionally self-confident cook, this is not the time to try complicated new recipes. Exotic and exhaustion really don't go together.

Be sure, by the way, to eat a good breakfast first, and to schedule a snack (fruit or a yogurt) partway through the morning and have lunch more or less at lunchtime. You will be far more productive if your blood sugar stays at a normal level.

If possible, get your children, spouse or guests to set the table. Children, especially, feel very proud when people notice how attractive it is.

Try very hard to make sure that you have time to take a shower and a little rest after you finish the preparations, before the guests come. You will be much more likely to enjoy the seder yourself – which, after all, you should.

This year, since the first seder is Saturday night, you should have time to relax during Shabbat. Give yourself a break – keep these meals simple.

Speaking of the first seder being Saturday night – that leads to even more complications. First, no preparations can be made before the end of Shabbat, which includes getting the food ready for the seder plate, setting the table, or heating up the food. Part of Friday should be spent roasting the eggs, cutting up whatever you are using for karpas (celery? parsley? potato?) and maror (whether you grate or slice horseradish, or use lettuce). Put everything in its own plastic baggie, label it if necessary and put it in the refrigerator.

The easiest thing is to cut up enough for both seders – just label each package with which seder it is for.

Real men....cook!

By CYNTHIA GASNER
Special to The CJN

When I received the assignment to interview four or five men – community leaders – to write an article about recipes they like to make most at Passover, I thought I would have some difficulty.

But I was wrong. The first five I approached all replied, "Of course I cook and I would be delighted to share my recipes."

Thanks for these recipes go to Rabbi Baruch Frydman-Kohl, spiritual leader of Beth Tzedec Congregation; Bernie Farber, executive director, Canadian Jewish Congress, Ontario region; Donald Carr, community leader, lawyer and chairman of the board of The CJN; Allan Cooper, chair of the Family Law Section of the Ontario Section of the Canadian Bar Association and past president of Kehillat Shaarei Torah Congregation; and David Novak, chair of the Jewish Studies Program, University of Toronto.

GÂTEAU DE MOUSSE AU CHOCOLAT

Submitted by Rabbi Baruch Frydman-Kohl

A very rich French chocolate mousse cake which is delightful as dessert at the seder before the afikoman. Adapted from a Craig Claiborne recipe.

½ lb. (8 squares) unsweetened chocolate
½ lb. unsalted pareve margarine cut into cubes, plus margarine to grease pan
8 egg yolks
1¼ cups sugar
5 egg whites
1 tbsp. powdered cocoa

Preheat oven to 350. Place chocolate and margarine into saucepan. Set pan into another pan of boiling water. While water simmers, stir the chocolate and margarine until mixture is melted and mixed together. This can also be done in a microwave oven.

Separate the eggs. In one bowl, blend egg yolks and sugar until mixture is light and lemon coloured. Add chocolate sauce to egg mixture. Stir to thoroughly blend.

Beat 5 egg whites until stiff (but not brittle). If you want, you may use all 8 egg whites to make the chocolate lighter. Add half the egg whites to the chocolate mixture and thoroughly blend. Gently fold in the remaining whites.

Grease the bottom and sides of an 8-inch springform pan. Pour ¼ of the mixture into the pan. Set aside the remaining chocolate mixture to use later as filling and frosting. Place pan in oven and bake 75 minutes at 350.

When cake is done (test with toothpick), allow to cool on a rack for 10-15 minutes. Remove rim from springform pan and allow cake to completely cool. Use the uncooked chocolate mixture to coat the sides of the cake, building up a small rim on the top. Then spoon the rest of the mixture on top of the cake and smooth the surface. Using a small sieve, sprinkle the cocoa over the top of the cake. Chill and serve. Serves 8-10.

PESACH MAYONNAISE

Submitted by Bernie Farber

I love this recipe because it will keep for the entire holiday of Pesach and can be used with so many other forshpeis and goodies.

1 whole egg
½ tsp. salt
2 tbsp. fresh lemon juice
¼ tsp. white pepper
1 cup vegetable oil

In a blender or food processor, blend egg, salt, lemon juice and pepper till well mixed (20-30 seconds). Very slowly add oil in a steady but thin stream while machine is running (if you are using a food processor you may wish to use your on/off switch for this), blend/process until ingredients meld into a thick mayonnaise. Must be kept refrigerated.

PESACH CHICKEN CACCIATORE (OR KOSHERSTORY)

Submitted by Donald Carr

1 chicken for frying
3 tbsp. cooking oil (or maybe a little more!)
1 medium clove of garlic (take off the skin) dash of pepper (no sneezing!)
½ cup sliced onion (no crying!)
1 cup sliced mushrooms (wash before slicing, of course!)
1 cup ketchup (Israeli is best)
1 cup water
2 tbsp. chopped parsley or 2 fresh bay leaves
½ tsp, salt
2 tbsp. kosher dry red wine

Cut up chicken into eight pieces (watch the fingers, the knife is sharp; have bandaids ready). Brown on all sides in frying pan with some of the oil (best to use an electric pan on "low" – and don't burn).

Sprinkle with pepper ("dash" means as much as you think you will need); remove chicken (not with the fingers, use tongs and put on paper towelling to drain of oil).

Discard remaining oil in frying pan (not into wet sink or you'll get steamed up), and add a little fresh oil to pan and wait until heated.

Then make the sauce: saute onions, mushrooms and garlic, but only until lightly browned. Stir in ketchup, water, parsley, bay leaf and wine (if you want to cheat, substitute more wine for water!), sprinkle in the salt (between thumb and forefinger to look professional).

Take the pieces of chicken and add to the frying pan, mix well with the sauteed ingredients. Simmer uncovered for 30 to 40 minutes, until chicken is tender and the sauce is desired consistency (not too many, not too thick!). So if you want more, double up everything. Serves 4-5.

FRUIT COMPOTE

(A moving experience)
Submitted by Allan Cooper

2 cups pitted prunes
¼ cup raisins
¾ cup dried apricots
½ cup dried pears
1 tsp. cinnamon
½ lemon thinly sliced
⅔ cup of sweet red wine
2 cups of water orange juice to taste (optional)

Organization is the key to Passover preparations

No chametz can be eaten after 10:40 a.m. on Saturday, but bread must be used for the Shabbat meals. Therefore, on this day, the Shabbat seudah (or at least the challah, followed by the grace after meals) must be eaten before that time.

Furthermore, the chametz is burned on Friday, but the Kol Chamira prayer, which nullifies the chametz, is not said until Shabbat, before 12.03 p.m.

Many shuls have congregational meals to deal with this problem. Otherwise, keep a small area separate and have the bread on newspaper, disposable utensils, plastic tablecloths, or towels – anything that can contain the crumbs, and be folded up and disposed of. Egg matzah can be used instead of bread, especially for children and those with health problems.

If the weather is good, you can even eat the bread on the porch or patio. Just be sure to clean it all up.

The siyum bechorim, the fast of the first-born, is held Thursday, April 5, and the bedikat chametz, the search for chametz, is done that evening.

While no one can deny that the days before Pesach can be somewhat hysterical, try to take a little while at some point to read the story of the first Passover and reflect on the reason we do what we do. Believe me on this too – it makes it all worthwhile.

Real men....cook!

Combine all the above ingredients in a pot. Cover and simmer (do not boil) until soft. This will take about 10 to 15 minutes. Stir frequently. If needed, add water to prevent the fruit from sticking. Cool.

If desired, add orange juice to taste to thin out syrup. Preparation time: 5 minutes. Cooking time: about 10 to 15 minutes.

CHICKEN WITH PEACHES AND CASHEWS

Easy and Spectacular
Submitted by Allan Cooper

8 boneless chicken breasts sliced thinly
¼ cup of potato starch
Dredging mixture:
⅓ cup potato starch
1¼ cups matzah meal
½ tsp. garlic powder
¼ tsp. black pepper
2 eggs, lightly beaten with 2 tbsp. of water
1 can peaches in syrup
⅓ cup sliced cashews oil for frying
paprika

Rinse chicken breasts in water, shake and dust with potato starch. Dip in egg-water mixture. Dredge in matzah meal mixture.

Lightly brown in frying pan. Place in pyrex baking dish and cover with peaches and syrup. Brown cashews lightly and sprinkle over chicken. Sprinkle with paprika. Cover loosely with tin foil. Bake at 350 for an hour.

Remove the foil and bake an additional 10 minutes. Garnish with parsley before serving. Preparation time: 20 minutes. Cooking time: 1 hour, 10 minutes.

Note: This chicken is equally delicious if you substitute apricots and almonds. This is an ideal dish for Shabbat, yom tov and especially for a seder because it can be held covered in a warm oven and will not dry out.

Tip: If you find the amount of liquid scant for the number or size of chicken breasts you have, add orange juice or white wine as needed.

Saute celery, onion and mushrooms 5 to 7 minutes in melted fat. Mix farfel and juice and add to vegetables. Stir in salt, pepper and ginger. Remove from heat and stir in egg and parsley. Bake in greased dish 11 x 13 at 350 for ½ hour until top is lightly browned.

Side dishes are a main part of the meal

By BARBARA SILVERSTEIN
Special to The CJN

Finding interesting and nutritious side dishes can present a challenge during Passover, when many of the standard side dish ingredients like rice, pasta, couscous, beans and tabouli are generally off limits in the Ashkenazi tradition. (Passover dietary laws differ slightly in the Sephardi tradition.)

The matzah-meal kugel in all its variations may be a highly anticipated staple of the traditional seder meal, but it may wear out its welcome – as a leftover or made-fresh from scratch – if it reappears as a side dish at too many other Passover meals. However, cooks don't have to look far or go exotic to add some variety to Passover fare.

The lowly potato, that much-loved, edible tuber, can add much-needed versatility to Passover meals. For instance, potato latkas, while traditionally associated with Chanukah are also a welcomed treat during Passover, as a main course or a side dish.

Potatoes have long been called poor man's fare or peasant food, but not all spuds fall in the no frills category. If you want to add a little colour and variety to a meal, you can splurge on tiny red new potatoes or finger-shaped blue potatoes.

Bonnie Stern offers a variety of healthy side-dishes in her latest book, HeartSmart Cooking for Family and Friends (Random House Canada) – Stuffed Baked Potatoes are dairy; Lynn's Lemon Potatoes are pareve.

STUFFED BAKED POTATOES

From HeartSmart Cooking for Family and Friends

3 large baking potatoes
1 tsp. ground cumin
½ cup low fat yogurt or light sour cream
½ cup grated old cheddar or crumbled blue cheese
3 green onions, chopped
½ tsp. salt
½ tsp. pepper

Scrub potatoes. Place on baking sheet and bake in a pre-heated 400-degree oven for 1 to 1½ hours, or until potatoes are very tender.

Cut potatoes in half lengthwise. Gently scoop out flesh, leaving a shell ¼ to ½-in. thick.

Mash potato flesh with cumin, yogurt, cheese, green onions, salt and pepper. Taste and adjust seasonings if necessary. Spoon potatoes back into potato shells.

Arrange potatoes in single layer on baking sheet. Reheat at 400 degrees for 20 minutes or until thoroughly heated.

Makes 6 servings. This recipe can be assembled a day ahead to the end of step 3. Bake the potatoes just before serving.

LYNN'S LEMON POTATOES

From HeartSmart Cooking for Family and Friends

3 lb. baking potatoes or Yukon gold potatoes
2 tbsp. chopped fresh rosemary or ½ tsp. dried
½ tsp. salt
¼ tsp. pepper
1½ cups chicken stock or water
⅓ cup lemon juice

Peel and scrub potatoes. Cut into 2-inch chunks. Place in 13x9-in. baking dish and sprinkle with rosemary, salt and pepper. Combine stock and lemon juice and pour over potatoes. Bake in preheated oven at 400 for 1½ to 2 hours, stirring occasionally, until potatoes are tender, tops are crispy and brown, and almost all the liquid has evaporated. Makes 8 servings.

MASHED POTATOES PANCAKES

From To Life! Setting a New Standard for Delectable Healthy Eating within Cherished Kosher Traditions (Culture Concepts) by Thelma Barer-Stein, Esther Schwartz and Risa Vandersluis

4 cups cooked mashed potatoes
3 large beaten eggs
¼ cup of finely chopped parsley
2 finely chopped green onions
½ cup matzah meal
salt and pepper to taste

In a large mixing bowl, combine all the ingredients. Shape mixture into golf-sized balls, then pat into a thick circle. Brown both side on a hot griddle. Keep warm until served. Prepare ahead and reheat in oven or microwave. Serves 4.

Vancouver caterer and food writer Susan Mendelson offers a no-fat potato and mushroom terrine in the Lazy Gourmet (Whitecap Books), which she co-wrote with chef Joey Cruz.

WILD MUSHROOM TERRINE

from the Lazy Gourmet

8 potatoes
4 cups mixed wild mushrooms (portobello, button, shiitake etc.)
salt and freshly ground black pepper to taste
1½ to 2 cups vegetable stock

Preheat oven to 350. Grease a 9x13-inch glass baking dish. Peel and thinly slice the potatoes (a mandoline is the best tool for this.) Thinly slice mushrooms. Cover the bottom of the baking dish with ½ in. of potatoes. Place all the mushrooms on top and cover with another 1 in. of potatoes.

Season with salt and pepper. Pour the vegetable stock over all to a depth of ½ in.

Oil one side of aluminum foil and lightly cover potatoes, oiled side down. Bake one hour then remove foil. Bake another 30 to 45 minutes or until a knife goes through the centre easily. Remove from oven. Place a heavy object on top the terrine to compress it while cooling, for about 1 hour.

To serve, cut the terrine into squares, place on greased cookie sheet and reheat at 350 for 10 to 15 minutes. Serves 8.

Cookbook brims with family memories

By CATHY THOMAS
The Orange County Register

The first edition of Judy Bart Kancigor's Melting Pot Memories sold out in six weeks in spring 1999. Since then, three more editions have been printed, with a total of more than 3,200 copies sold.

At first, she says, she was surprised by the brisk sales of her self-published cookbook.

The book contains over 300 pages of mouth-watering recipes from 159 family members ranging in age from 10 to 92, and a Passover section, including dishes such as Aunt Hilda's Cherry Chili Chicken, a savoury-sweet roast chicken dish with raisins and pitted black cherries (most probably from the '40s), her incredible Fruit-Topped Matzah Schalat, and her Aunt Sally's Chocolate Nut Passover Cake.

The most common response that Kancigor hears from readers is regret over not having documented their own family stories and recipes.

"I didn't set out to write a cookbook," said Kancigor, mother of two and grandmother of three.

"The cousins had gathered together in 1996, when my Aunt Estelle was dying. It occurred to me that we were losing one generation at the same time as I was waiting for my first grandchild to be born. The next generation wouldn't know any of our history. Wouldn't know our food.

"I thought about our family recipes, and how they needed to be saved," she recalled, remembering the food-splattered pages of her Aunt Estelle's handwritten recipes.

Her aunt's son brought the recipe-filled, well-worn, black and white notebook to the hospital. Her aunt pointed out the recipes she thought should be included in the cookbook, which at that point, was thought of exclusively as a "for family only" publication.

Kancigor turned to her cousins, asking for more recipes, as well as photos, old clippings and remembrances. Soon, anyone related by blood or marriage was contributing to the book: 600 recipes from 159 relatives, in-laws of in-laws contributing stories, photos, letters, jokes, poems and drawings along with their signature recipes.

And like most families, many of the Rabinowitz mishpachah culinary memories focus on the holidays.

Ask most children what their favourite holiday is, and Chanukah is the quick response, Kancigor writes. "For me all the blue and gold boxes in the world can't hold a shamash to Passover. You can't beat the cuisine; I never did understand how eating those luscious matzah treats helped us remember the suffering of our ancestors.

"For the Rabinowitz cousins, raised together as practically siblings, our childhood was the New York version of the movie Avalon (without the fire)... There were so many of us that [grandfather] Papa Harry put a board on the children's table."

AUNT HILDA'S CHERRY CHILI CHICKEN

16 oz. can pitted black cherries, juice reserved
¾ cup raisins
2 (about 2½ to 3 pounds each) chickens, cut in fourths garlic powder, to taste
salt and pepper, to taste
paprika, to taste
2 tbsp. vegetable oil
3 cups chili sauce (recipe follows)
¼ cup water
⅓ cup dark brown sugar
2 large onions, thinly sliced, about 4 cups
½ cup sweet sherry or wine

Preliminaries: Place raisins in small bowl; pour juice from canned cherries over raisins. Set aside. Preheat oven to 325. Season chicken with garlic powder, salt, pepper and paprika. Heat oil in large, deep skillet on medium-high heat. Brown chicken on all sides, working in batches. Place chicken skin side up in large baking pan.

In medium bowl, combine chili sauce, water, brown sugar, onions and raisins (with cherry juice); pour over chicken. Roast uncovered 40 minutes, basting occasionally.

Mix cherries with sherry or wine; pour over chicken; bake 30 minutes more. Place chicken on serving platter. Spoon some sauce and fruit over chicken. Yield: 8 servings.

IDF motivation high despite violence

By AVI MACHLIS
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

JERUSALEM — As Israeli-Palestinian violence hits the six-month mark, Israeli military officials report that soldiers remain motivated to serve in the West Bank and Gaza Strip.

Senior military officials report that reservists, who account for 70 percent of the army's 639,150 troops, are reporting for duty at higher rates than before the intifadah began. This contrasts with past years, when reservists often found excuses to evade service.

According to Brig.-Gen. Avinoam Laufer, head of the Israel Defence Force's planning and logistics division, about 95 percent of reservists who have recently been drafted have reported for duty.

This compares to about 85 percent who reported for duty before Palestinian violence began last September.

"The feeling among reservists, like in the public at large, is that something must be done," Laufer said, adding that in recent years soldiers' motivation has tended to rise when times got tougher.

The army does not yet have clear indications about how the intifadah is affecting new recruits or conscripted soldiers.

Soldiers currently being drafted were polled about their attitudes last year, before the wave of violence began.

Those polls indicated that there had then been a 4 percent decline in the motivation of young Israelis to serve in combat units.

That decline came when Israel appeared to be on the brink of peace deals, Laufer said.

"When there is a feeling that we are moving toward a good peace, motivation tends to decline," he said. "When the situation deteriorates, motivation goes up."

Nevertheless, Laufer admits that during the first intifadah, between 1987 and 1993, there was a clear deterioration in the motivation of reservists to serve as the conflict dragged on and soldiers were called repeatedly to police the Palestinians.

The apparent increase in motivation, as measured in terms of reserve turnout, comes amid a rising death toll.

Since the violence began in late September, 67 Israelis – 38 civilians and 29 soldiers – have been killed by the Palestinians.

Israel has killed at least 348 Palestinians over the same period.

For Israel, the death toll is very high when compared with the number killed by Hezbollah gunmen during the last five years of the Israeli presence in southern Lebanon.

Between 1995 and 1999, about 25 Israeli soldiers were killed in Lebanon. Even that death toll was enough to break the Israeli consensus over maintaining a presence there.

Palestinians were jubilant when Israel withdrew from Lebanon last year, citing Hezbollah's war as a model the Palestinians themselves should follow.

Israeli military officials, however, said the Palestinians were making a "crude miscalculation" if they hope to copy Hezbollah tactics and wear down Israeli society and military morale through a war of attrition.

If the Palestinians concluded from the Lebanon case "that with a big enough pile of bodies we will go home or go somewhere else," they misunderstood Israeli policy, said one military official, speaking on condition of anonymity.

"If that's the logic, if they think they will pile up the numbers and get a Lebanon outcome, it's a historic confusion of the accidental and the existential," the official said.

Military assessments of Israel's staying power come amid reports that the Palestinians may be reassessing their strategy.

Some Palestinians are said to be calling for public protests with a lower level of violence, alongside the guerrilla-style warfare by armed militias that has been the staple in recent months, and that has cost the Palestinians a degree of international sympathy.

As recently as Sunday, however, another Israeli was wounded in a drive-by shooting in the West Bank.

While the continued violence appears to have rallied Israeli soldiers and society behind the national unity government's refusal to negotiate under fire, there are, however, some signs of cracks in the consensus.

Yesh Gvul, the movement that supports soldiers who refuse to serve in the West Bank or Gaza Strip, says it has handled 10 cases of conscripted soldiers and fielded calls from up to 80 reservists who refuse to help suppress the current intifadah, including a "high proportion" of junior officers.

Even the relatively small numbers are significant, however, since in the past, young conscripted soldiers almost never dared to challenge military discipline by refusing to serve, according to Peretz Kidron, a Yesh Gvul activist.

Tamar Hermann, director of the Tami Steinmitz Center for Peace Research at Tel Aviv University, said Israelis from across the political spectrum are rallying around the flag.

"Even those Israelis who supported unilateral withdrawal from Lebanon are now much more skeptical of such a move so close to home in the West Bank," she said.

But Hermann's polls also show that, while Israelis have a high level of confidence in the IDF, 50 percent of the respondents do not believe there is a military solution to the current conflict, compared with only 41 percent who think more force would help.

Internet site offers Nazi items for sale

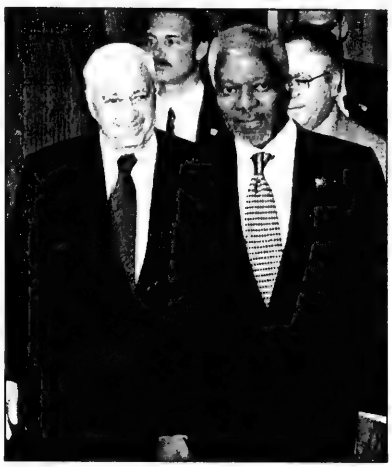
Many are service pins, coins and Nazi-era stamps. One item was a copy of Leni Reifenstahl's propaganda film, Triumph of the Will.

Another was a CD of Nazi songs and speeches. A disclaimer stated: "This item is intended for historical research, re-enacting or display ONLY [sic]. It is not meant to glorify the Nazi government or its policies, nor does it symbolize agreement with racist ideals."

The auctioneer also noted that "according to auction regulations, I cannot accept bids from people living in Germany, France and Austria."

eBay did not return requests for an interview. The Internet did not create the market for fake Nazi memorabilia, Rabbi Cooper said. Ten years ago, knock-off items were available at gun show and swap meets. eBay came along and attempted to maximize its traffic by marketing to the element interested in Nazi-era memorabilia, he said.

Recently, faced with concerns about the Nazi materials and with rumours that anything could be available on the auction site, including a human kidney, the company seems to have modified its policy.As a result of public concerns, "the company had to monitor its corporate practice," Rabbi Cooper said.



A NEW YORK GREETING: Israeli Prime Minister Ariel Sharon met last week with U.N. Secretary General Kofi Annan. [RNS/Reuters photo]

The Star, alone in its opinion

It is the prerogative of newspapers to adopt editorial positions, especially strong ones, on issues they determine are of importance, and with which some of their readers may and often do disagree, equally strongly. That's a given.

However, it is another matter entirely to base an editorial on a misreading of the facts. The Toronto Star's editorial, "Mideast chill" (March 21), illustrates the latter case in a particularly nasty, pre-emptive fashion.

Contrary to other major news reports on Israeli Prime Minister Ariel Sharon's recent visit to Washington – "Bush and Sharon Find Much in Common," New York Times, "Bush Assures Sharon on U.S. role in Talks," Washington Post, and similar reports in the Israeli media, to say nothing of Sharon's own positive assessment – the Star alone claimed that things had gone badly for the Israeli leader at the White House.

Jumping off the mark one day after Sharon met George Bush in the White House – even before major U.S. newspapers editorialized about the meeting – the Star determined that Bush had given Sharon the cold shoulder.

What was the evidence for this negative assessment? Why has the Star seen things in Washington that no other seasoned observer there has seen?

Referring to Sharon, the Star claimed, "But the world, and the U.S. presidency, have grown weary of intractable Mideast politicians." That too, is contrary to the facts. If Washington has grown weary of any Mideast figure, it is Yasser Arafat, who, it is widely understood in U.S. policy circles, has snubbed American efforts to promote peace, and has deliberately turned to violence in place of negotiations.

It appears that the Star has decided in advance that since nothing good can come from Sharon, whatever happens involving him must somehow conform to their pre-existing negative judgment of him.

What the long-term American attitude will be towards Sharon remains to be seen, and will depend on several factors we cannot foretell. But at least the current U.S. position is to give Sharon a chance, especially by agreeing in principle with him that, contrary to what the Star claims, formal negotiations cannot resume in an atmosphere of unremitting Palestinian voilence.

Israeli kidnapped in West Bank, then freed

By NAOMI SEGAL
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

JERUSALEM — David Haim was lucky to live up to his last name after venturing into the Palestinian city of Tulkarm for lunch.

Two months ago, two restaurant owners from Tel Aviv were kidnapped and murdered when they went to Tulkarm to purchase flower pots.

But on Sunday, Haim was released unharmed after Palestinian security officials rescued him from militia members who had taken him captive.

A 25-year-old Haifa resident, Haim had gone to the West Bank city earlier in the day with three Israeli Arabs and was eating in a restaurant when armed Palestinians kidnapped him. The Israeli Arabs were released.

Alerted to the abduction, Palestinian Authority (PA) officials located the kidnappers and arranged for Haim's release.

Haim said he was "treated well" by both his abductors and the PA officials who rescued him.

Israeli police said charges would be brought against Haim for violating a ban on Israelis entering areas under Palestinian control.

Israeli security sources were quoted as saying that PA President Yasser Arafat had ordered Haim's release.

Prime Minister Ariel Sharon's office praised the PA response, saying it indicated an interest in preventing an escalation of the last six months of violence.

Despite the rare instance of Israeli-Palestinian security co-operation, however, Israeli troops and armed Palestinians clashed on Sunday in the West Bank and Gaza Strip.

In the West Bank, Palestinian gunmen seriously wounded a Jewish settler in a drive-by shooting near Nablus.

In Gaza, five grenades were thrown at Israeli soldiers stationed near the border with Egypt. The soldiers returned fire, but no injuries were reported.

In another incident Sunday, Palestinian gunfire hit a synagogue in the settlement of Neveh Dekalim in the southern Gaza Strip.

Last weekend at least 12 Palestinians were wounded in clashes.

Israeli Defence Minister Benjamin Ben-Eliezer told the Cabinet on Sunday that violence had dropped in the West Bank in the past week but increased in Gaza.

Meanwhile, the Israel Defence Force said it is stepping up security measures around Israeli communities bordering the West Bank and Gaza as Palestinians try to push the conflict into Israel proper.

The statement followed last week's Palestinian shelling of an IDF base near Kibbutz Nahal Oz, located inside Israel near the Gaza border.

On Sunday, Ben-Eliezer approved measures to ease restrictions on Palestinians.

Reports said Ben-Eliezer approved permits to allow hundreds of Palestinian workers into Israel. The workers, who must be at least 40 and married, were approved to do harvesting work.

Sharon has said he opposes collective punishment of the Palestinian population and would work to ease civilians' hardships, while fighting those who order and carry out attacks on Israel.

Sharon met Sunday with the U.S.-led Mitchell Committee probing the causes of the six-month-old violence in the region.

The head of the committee, former U.S. Sen. George Mitchell, said earlier Sunday that the fact-finding commission is "not a tribunal. We do not believe that anyone is on trial."

Lebanese PM bans Holocaust denial conference in Beirut

Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

BEIRUT — Lebanese Prime Minister Rafik Hariri announced last Friday that a conference in support of Holocaust denial, which was scheduled to be held in Beirut later this month, was banned and cancelled.

The decision of the Lebanese government followed calls by Jewish organizations and Arab intellectuals for the cancellation of the conference.

"Lebanon has more important things to do than hold conferences which harm its international standing and which stain its good name," Hariri was quoted as saying.

The conference, called Zionism and Revisionism, was being funded by U.S. and Swiss-based organizations. Preparations for the event, which was to take place on March 31, are still continuing, according to some reports.

The Jewish National Congress has accused Iran of being behind the leading organizer, a Swiss citizen, Joergen Graff, who heads a group called the Truth and Justice Institute. In 1988, Graff was sentenced to 15 months imprisonment in Switzerland for violating laws against racism, but fled the country and spent time in Tehran.

Hatsbani River station starts pumping water

By SHARON GAL
Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — Last Sunday, Lebanon began operating the pumping station it built near the Hatsbani River north of the village of Ghajar in Israel.

The station is a very small one, Lebanese officials said, built only to supply water to the nearby village of Al Wazani. The paving of an access road to the site continues. The flags of Lebanon and the Hezbollah fly over the pumping station.

As pumping of water began Sunday morning, the station was the site of considerable commotion with the arrival of numerous visitors. United Nations Interim Force in Lebanon vehicles were visible from the Israeli side of the border.

The UN recently said Israel's fear of the construction of the pumping station is unfounded, adding that the station will only pump water to the Al Wazani village in 10-centimetre pipes. Lebanon announced that it plans to pump 300 cubic metres of water to the village daily.

"This is a very small amount, almost negligible. With the pipes it has laid, Lebanon can pump 1,000 cubic metres a day, which is not a large amount either," a Mekorot Water Company official told Ha'aretz.

Yeshiva University struggles to find place in modern Orthodoxy

By JULIE WIENER
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

NEW YORK — For 25 years, Rabbi Norman Lamm has been not only the president of Yeshiva University (YU), but also the unofficial president of modern Orthodoxy in America.

Both the university and this wing of Orthodoxy have a mission of "Torah u'maddah" – literally, Torah and science – balancing Jewish learning and strict adherence to Jewish law with engagement in the world at large.

Now, with Lamm planning to retire as of August 2002, the direction of both YU and modern Orthodoxy is somewhat unclear.

Finding a successor will be a challenge. With Orthodoxy becoming increasingly factionalized, observers say it will be difficult to find someone who shares Lamm's combination of rabbinic and academic credentials – he has degrees in both chemistry and Jewish philosophy – and his ability to raise funds.

Compounding the uncertainty about modern Orthodoxy's future is the fact that its other major institution in the United States – the Orthodox Union (OU) – is also seeking to replace its top professional.

The individuals who replace Lamm and the OU's Rabbi Raphael Butler, who resigned in late January in the wake of a major scandal, will have a major influence on the character of modern Orthodoxy.

Jonathan Sarna, the Braun professor of Jewish history at Brandeis University, said that regardless of their position on the ideological spectrum, the incoming leaders of YU and the OU "are going to face some very substantial challenges" because "Orthodoxy's era of triumphalism is probably coming to a close."

In a recent article in the journal Sh'ma, Sarna argues that Orthodoxy's future in North America is threatened by a "severe leadership crisis," a "brain drain" to Israel and sharp divisions between right-wing and left-wing factions over how to confront modernity.

But under Lamm's watch, both Orthodoxy in general and YU in particular have seen considerable growth.

In addition to its rabbinical seminary and undergraduate programs serving Orthodox Jews, YU is also a non-sectarian institution with prestigious graduate schools in areas such as law and medicine.

Lamm is widely praised for rescuing YU from financial disaster, for being an articulate and inspiring speaker and for increasing the university's enrolment and prestige.

But Orthodoxy and its flagship institution have also faced serious tensions and splits during Lamm's tenure, primarily in balancing secular and Jewish values.

YU has faced competing demands from the academic faculty and the leaders of religious instruction at the Rabbi Isaac Elchanan Theological Seminary, which ordains approximately 35 to 40 rabbis each year.

Tensions flared recently over clubs for gay students – and whether to allow same-sex couples to live in married-student housing – in the non-sectarian graduate schools.

Some on Orthodoxy's right wing say Lamm has not imposed a strong enough Orthodox imprint on the university and say he went too far by creating an advanced Talmud program for women. Talmud study has traditionally been reserved for men.

On the other side of the ideological spectrum are modern Orthodox leaders disappointed that Lamm distanced himself from Edah, a fledgling, left- leaning organization whose motto is "the courage to be modern and Orthodox."

In the past two years, two rival rabbinical seminaries have opened in New York – Lander College and Yeshiva Chovevei Torah – on the right and left of Orthodoxy respectively, because of the perception that YU no longer met their constituents' needs.

Some critics say that the secular and Judaic faculties at YU barely communicate with each other.

Because Lamm's position requires serving such divergent constituencies, some speculate that he will be replaced with two people: one to oversee YU's secular academic side and one to oversee Judaic study.

But Lamm said dividing the position in two is not a desirable solution. One person should fill the presidency "to symbolize what the university stands for – Torah u'maddah," he said.

"This position requires a balancing act," he said. "And you can't balance if you have two personalities. It's difficult enough as one person."

Among the names being floated as possible successors to Lamm are Rabbi Shlomo Riskin, chief rabbi of Efrat, an Israeli settlement near Jerusalem; Rabbi Jonathan Sacks, chief Orthodox rabbi of England; and Rabbi Jacob Schacter, founding dean of the Rabbi Joseph B. Soloveitchik Institute in suburban Boston.

Norman Lamm

Lamm disagrees with those who say that YU, particularly its rabbinic school and undergraduate program, has moved steadily to the right during his tenure.

"If by the right, one means greater dedication to the study and analysis of Torah, then we are to the right and I welcome it," Lamm said.

"If by right you mean we're benighted neanderthals and provincials and people who hate everyone else, no absolutely not," he continued.

"Are there some individuals who qualify for such opprobrium? Yes, and some have left. But for the greater part, the [heads of the Judaic program] are dedicated, brilliant people and are rational people, and entitled to their own opinions and nuances."

Among the issues dividing modern Orthodox Jews in recent years have been the extent to which they should cooperate with liberal streams of Judaism, support secular academic pursuits as well as religious learning and embrace efforts to give women a larger role in Jewish learning and worship.

Rabbi Saul Berman, a professor at YU's Stern College, co-founder of the new, more liberal Chovevei Torah seminary and director of Edah, said the openings within the OU and YU are an opportunity "for the lay and rabbinic leadership to redefine the direction in which the institutions of the modern Orthodox community are going to be moving over the next quarter of a century, if not longer."

It remains to be seen whether anyone will be able to walk the kind of tightrope Lamm has.

Rabbi Yosef Blau, the mashgiach ruchani – spiritual guidance counselor – at YU's rabbinic seminary, said Lamm's overall record was positive.

"The vast majority of [rabbis]...would say yes, over the years they thought Rabbi Lamm was weak on this issue or that issue," Blau said. "But if you look back at the total picture and see how Yeshiva University has grown and developed, including the rabbinical school, he balanced all the pressures really well."

Koffler exhibit looks at the past through the lens

By LARA RABINOVITCH
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — Jewish Canadian artists Jill Culiner, Simon Glass and Rafael Goldchain all interpret history through the lenses of their cameras.

The three photographic artists were featured in a panel discussion on March 8 at the Koffler Gallery in conjunction with the opening of Jill Culiner's exhibit La Mémoire Effacée, which runs until April 22 at the Koffler Gallery in the Bathurst Jewish Community Centre.

Moderating the panel was Belarie Zatzman, associate professor of theatre at Atkinson College, York University.

While all three artists use archival photographs as the basis of their works, Zatzman noted that each uses the material differently to achieve distinct meanings.

Currently living in France, Culiner has exhibited throughout Europe. La Mémoire Effacée, her first exhibition in North America, is a six-part series, each composed of a multitude of photographs and text. Grainy archival photographs of World War I and World War II, as well as documentary images of Jewish life in Central and Eastern Europe, are paired with Culiner's photographs.

Culiner juxtaposes old, blurred photographs of World War I battlefields alongside her photographic depictions of the same field today.

"It was by pure chance that I started this work," she said. "A friend of mine found [the World War II photos] in his great uncle's attic, and he handed them over to me. I decided I would go and visit the battlefields.

"It's a very strange feeling [because] you have these great expanses of fields and there's nothing going on. You can't imagine that there was ever a battle there."

Gripped with a desire to uncover the history of collaborationist France during World War II, as well as Nazi Germany, she also visited concentration camp sites.

In her exhibition, Culiner places archival photographs of, for example, prison barracks at Dachau in the 1940s immediately next to coloured, yet faded images of tourists standing in the same location in 1994.

Culiner's photographic artwork similarly incorporates the history of lost European Jewish communities. "I knew I had to try and discover the shtetls. I knew I would find nothing. I still keep looking for something that's gone."

The exhibit evokes "a sense of walking from village to village," Zatzman said. "There's a sense of the documentary as we see the images."

Simon Glass's work also evokes a journey through remembrance. The Hebrew language and the Holocaust are central to his photographic art, which has been exhibited in Canada, Japan and Russia.

Glass, an instructor of photography at University of Toronto, Sheridan College and the Toronto School of Art, introduced his works by saying, "I am not a documentary photographer."

His "semi-abstract" photographs, such as those of the barbed-wired fences at Auschwitz, are representative of images that have become synonymous with the Holocaust. Kabbalistic symbolism, Jewish mysticism and mythology also recur thematically throughout his work.

Jill Culiner [pictured left, with Belarie Zatzman] juxtaposes old, blurred photographs of World War I battlefields alongside her photographic depictions of the same field today.

Like Culiner, Glass draws on archival photography as the basis of his artwork. His series, "Rachum V'chanun" (Merciful and Gracious), named for two of the 13 attributes of God, includes liturgical text superimposed on headshots of concentration camp inmates taken by Nazis.

Some of these eerie photographs have survived, Glass explained, because "as the Soviet forces were advancing, prisoners were instructed to destroy the photographs. People who worked in the photo-lab area deliberately put so many photographs in the stove as to clog the air vents to prevent them from burning."

Memory is also a dominant theme in Rafael Goldchain's photographs. Goldchain, a teacher at York University and Sheridan College, has exhibited in Canada, Mexico, the United States, Germany and Japan.

His most recent series, Goldchain said, reflects his need "to establish a connection" with his ancestors.

"I was looking for some kind of visual means... to deal with the idea of idegtity, of the unique... circumstances in which I was born as a Latin American Jew."

Inspired by a few original photographs of his relatives, Goldchain's works feature himself dressed and posed as he imagines, remembers, or reinvents his grandparents or other family members.

All three artists are on a search for the past, an endless journey. As Goldchain put it, "You cannot retrieve [the past] completely, you can only retrieve a ghost image of it."

Schulhoff Concert: Jewish composer Ervin Schulhoff wrote extensively, oscillating between expressionism and neoclassicism and jazz experimentalism, after his return to Prague from postwar Germany in 1923 and into the early 1930s. He died in a Nazi concentration camp in 1942.

Pianist Andrew Burashko and his nine-piece Art of Time Ensemble perform some of Schulhoff's works at the Glenn Gould Studio, Monday, April 2, 8 p.m. $25. 416-205-5555.

TVO Presents Holocaust Doc: The Nazis, A Warning from History is a much-acclaimed six-part series that exposes many myths about the rise and fall of Adolf Hitler's empire and the workings of the Third Reich. Above all, the series illustrates how Hitler's rule was based on the active support of the German population rather than simple tyranny.

Originally produced by Laurence Rees for the BBC, the series airs in six weekly instalments on TVOntario, beginning Monday, April 2, 10 p.m.

Also of note is the German-made film The Nasty Girl, about a girl who writes an essay about My Hometown in the Third Reich. The film is in German with English subtitles, and airs on TVO Sunday, April 8, at 8 p.m.

Mauler goes back into the ring

By KATHRYN KATES
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — If Montreal-born Joe Gollob had not run away at 15 to escape his father's pressure to become a rabbi, then he might not have become the Canadian lightweight boxing champion from 1935 to 1937, a decorated war hero and a well-respected wrestling referee during the sport's glory years.

Recently, Gollob, 85, was asked by writer, producer and director John Dolin, to dust off his referee uniform and appear once again at Maple Leaf Gardens to re-enact actual scenes from his past in the ring, for a new, six-part, half-hour "docu-comedy," Wrestling With The Past. The show airs consecutive Saturday nights at 8 p.m. on The Comedy Network.

Gollob will appear in Episode 4 on March 31 and Episode 5 on April 7, alongside former CFL player Gene Kiniski, who credits Gollob on-air for saving his life by getting him safely out of the arenas when fan riots broke out.

For the series, Gollob got back into the ring with Killer Kowalski.

"Kowalski was famous for tearing off Yukon Eric's ear. I was the referee for that match – I just put the bloody ear in my pocket. At the taping of the show, I surprised Kowalski by handing him a fake ear," Gollob says with a chuckle.

His first foray into sports came when he was coached in boxing at Montreal's YMHA and later coached others there before opening his own place, the CNR-sponsored Pioneer Athletic Club.

In 1932, he went to the Los Angeles Olympics, but broke his hand in the semi-finals and had to bow out. In 1932, he became the first Canadian to win the U.S. Golden Glove Tournament at Madison Square Gardens in New York City. He turned pro in 1937.

Gollob's father eventually gave up his hope of raising a rabbi and became the young boxer's biggest booster, when his friends began noticing favourable articles about his athletic son in the local Montreal press.

"In 1937, I wanted the British Empire Championship so badly. Laurie Stevens in South Africa held the title and he wouldn't come to America, so I went to Johannesburg and won it. Ring magazine, the bible of boxing stated I had a perfect record, because of 151 fights, I lost seven, reversed four and couldn't get the other three back in the ring," explains Gentleman Joe, a moniker he earned for his good conduct.

He was also known as the Montreal Mauler and Waltzing Walloper, because of his aggressive hits and his dancing style in the ring. Before the war, he made his way to London by working as a deck hand on a Cunard Ship.

He made London his home base for coaching and fighting. In total, Gollob fought in 34 countries, including Germany. When wrestling fans found out he was Jewish, he understates: "I didn't have too many fans."

Gentleman Joe ended his boxing career when the war broke out. He joined the British Air Ministry as the physical training, boxing and sports co-ordinator for Air Cadets. He then joined the Royal Montreal Regiment in England, a reconnaissance regiment serving on the front lines in France, Belgium, Holland and Germany.

In 1950, Gollob began refereeing at the Montreal Forum, after watching a few matches and feeling confident that he could handle refereeing duties in the wrestling ring.

Discovering the Jews of West Virginia

By GERALD SCHWARTZ
Special to The CJN

WEST VIRGINIA — I never expected to discover a Jewish connection in the Appalachians and the Shenandoah Valley of Virginia and West Virginia.

I was headed to Berkley Springs, W.Va. With an extra day or so to kill before I was due to arrive, I stopped in nearby Martinsburg in Berkeley County.

Martinsburg is in the region of West Virginia called the Eastern Panhandle, where the states of Pennsylvania, Maryland, Virginia and West Virginia all meet.

West Virginia, the 35th state to join the Union, has a mainly rural, conservative, Christian heritage. Yet while strolling downtown on the main street in late afternoon, I spotted a faded sign high on a red brick building that read, "Ladies Apparel M. Cohen & Son."

My curiosity aroused, I walked further along the side streets and discovered the building that housed the Beth Jacob Synagogue and Community Centre from 1913 to 1952.

Originally an Orthodox shul, the synagogue became a Reform temple under the Union of American Hebrew Congregations, and hired student rabbis from Hebrew Union College. In 1963, it had a Sabbath rededication service. Providing children with a solid base of Jewish education was one of the congregation's main goals.

The first known account of Jews in Martinsburg is dated at 1790. Most Eastern European Jews who immigrated to the United States during the late 19th and early 20th centuries settled in the urban centres of the east and midwest. Yet others ventured off the beaten track, having heard about the opportunities in the black diamond (coal) mining and timber industries. They came to West Virginia – to Charleston, the state capital, and to the state's smaller towns as well.

By the end of the 19th century, there were enough Jewish families in Martinsburg to maintain a schochet, who also taught Hebrew to youngsters and officiated as rabbi during the High Holy Days in a rented hall.

In 1912, an old United Brethren Church building on the outskirts of town was bought for $1,700, remodelled and opened as the Bais Yankev Synagogue in 1913. Land for a Jewish cemetery was purchased in 1916.

The Jewish community thrived, growing as a result of refugees fleeing from Hitler's Europe. It appears that there was little organized anti-Semitism anywhere in the state and Jews had a full and mutually respectful coexistence with their neighbours.

A religious school was formed with its first confirmation or bar mitzvah in 1940. In the late '30s, the Bais Yankev synagogue became the Beth Jacob Congregation, an anglicized version of the original Yiddish name. In 1952, the congregation moved to a more central location in town.

However, with the usual problem of Jewish youngsters in small-town North America going off to school and not returning, the community dwindled. As well, the textile mills and apple farming, which were at the forefront of the town's economy, were downsized in the '50s.

Today, Martinsburg's population is about 14,000. The town has some interesting restored homes and business blocks, including a live theatre. The Belle Boyd House, still standing, was the home of the Civil War Confederate spy Belle Boyd. It contains a bookstore, a county museum and a Civil War museum.

The state capital, Charleston, still has a functioning synagogue, and there are small, scattered Jewish communities elsewhere nearby. A PBS documentary film has been made about the Jews of Beckley in southeastern West Virginia called Righteous Remnant: Jewish Survival in Appalachia.

There are five Civil War sites in the area of Martinsburg and nearby Shepherdstown, including the famous Harper's Ferry National Historic Park. The restored village of Harper's Ferry on the Potomac and Shenandoah Rivers is interesting to explore. As well, an easy ride south are the wonderful Luray Caverns and the scenic Skyline Drive in Virginia.

Exploring the lesser known state of West Virginia – actually created in 1863 in the midst of the Civil War – will yield many pleasant natural as well as people encounters.

Two years later, the Ontario Athletic Commission put out the word that they needed a referee who could handle the roughnecks in the ring. So Gollob moved to Toronto with his late wife Aileen, and they raised two sons Anthony, now 40 and a RCMP officer, and Michael, 34, a cardiologist working in Houston, Tex.

"It is a different scene in wrestling today. In my day, they had a lot of wrestling and a little showmanship. Now, it is all showmanship and a little wrestling," Gollob says.

Gollob refereed until 1989, in addition to working in security in the Toronto hotel industry and writing freelance articles for the Globe & Mail.

He was inducted into the Canadian Sports Hall of Fame on Oct. 31, 1980, and honoured by the Canadian military magazine, Esprit de Corps, as an outstanding Canadian.

The recreation room of Anthony's Whitby home, where Gollob now lives with his son, his daughter-in-law Cheryl, and his two grandchildren, Meagan, 8, and Derek, 5, is a testament to his successful past.

Hanging on the wall for visitors to see are the many accolades, awards, honours from the war and pictures of Gollob with both wrestling and boxing greats.

Jewish cancer survivors help fellow women

By CYNTHIA GASNER
Special to The CJN

Elizabeth Erlich (left) and Marci Tenenbaum, co-founders of L'Chaim Cancer Support Group for Jewish Women display some of the materials provided by the group to Jewish women undergoing cancer treatment.

TORONTO — About 50 Jewish women survivors of cancer are in the forefront of helping other Jewish women cope with the trauma of a cancer diagnosis and treatment.

Elizabeth Erlich, 49, whose children were nine, eight, seven and two when she was diagnosed with breast cancer five years ago, co-founded L'Chaim Cancer Support Group for Jewish Women with Marci Tenenbaum, 46, whose children were 11, 16, 19 and 21 when she was diagnosed with breast cancer in 1998.

After getting over the shock, Erlich said, "I phoned and spoke to my friend Marci Tenenbaum, a fellow cancer survivor. We realized that there was a need for a confidential and a non-denominational cancer peer support group for Jewish women."

In the summer of 1999, the group of dedicated Jewish women survivors of cancer was formed.

Erlich said that many women who approach the group for support say, "It is helpful to talk to someone who has gone through the same treatment. It lets me know what to expect and that it is doable."

Edie Weisbrod, who received radiation and chemotherapy, says she is "a proud member of L'Chaim" and grateful that she is able to help others. She was matched up with a woman in her 40s through the group's buddy system.

"She had a few treatments before she called the group," Weisbrod said. "Like myself, she was fearful of losing her hair, and most of all, what the future holds for her. I spoke with my new friend often."

Weisbrod answered her buddy's questions and directed her to other support sources. "We continue to speak often and it gives me a great sense of pleasure to have helped another cancer survivor."

The group offers two services. Their primary service is a telephone support network where Clara Shore is the first person that a cancer patient speaks to.

New patients are matched with survivors with similar histories and the buddy provides ongoing support throughout the course of treatment.

The second service is to visit newly diagnosed patients and bring gift bags including a binder with information about local support group meetings, resources available for cancer patients, spiritual help and information of interest to Jewish women. This area is under the direction of Sandi Singer.

The volunteers serve as positive role models, says Tenenbaum. "someone that truly understands what they are going through and can affirm that there is a light at the end of the tunnel."

She adds that the group stresses confidentiality. "I talked to one woman for months and didn't even know her name. We finally made one up.

"We offer informal peer support in a non-judgmental, caring and confidential manner."

Marsha Urowitz, whose role is to match newly diagnosed patients with a support buddy told The CJN, "The experience of matching volunteers to newly diagnosed women is one that is personally rewarding and fulfilling."

Erlich says that because they are in a Jewish group, "there is an instant feeling of connectedness. We even provide information about tehillim groups in our community in which psalms are recited in honour of patients facing serious illness, and we provide information about making a seudat hodah'ah, a Jewish meal of thanks to mark the end of treatment.

L'Chaim recently formed a speakers' bureau of cancer survivors for community meetings. For further information about L'Chaim Cancer Support Group for Jewish Women, or to volunteer, call 416-633-0409.

So you have a new baby?

By LEILA SPEISMAN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — When a couple has a baby, they think that everything about the experience is so special that they will remember every detail.

In fact, once the baby is born (especially after several babies are born) and the parents haven't slept for two months, everything coalesces into a giant blur.

Edith Itzkovici-Levy, a manager at the Royal Bank, was so thrilled at getting pregnant after first having difficulty conceiving and then having a miscarriage, that "I wanted to record everything, both for me, and for him when he is older."

"I wanted him to know how special it was for both his parents."

Itzkovici-Levy decided to keep a journal, both to keep track of the progress of the pregnancy and to send messages to the baby. She also made a video every month following the third or forth month.

Being an organized kind of person, Itzkovici-Levy kept notes on more than just what happened in what month. She also kept lists, such as what to take to the hospital, how to decorate the baby's room and what should go in the layette. "I gave the lists to my friends, and they really loved them," she told The CJN.

Itzkovici-Levy decided to combine the diary and the lists to make "something all-encompassing."

She combined all her ideas, put them on her computer, and gave copies to all her friends, to a pediatrician to make sure that all the information was accurate, and to focus groups.

While they were all enthusiastic, publishers were not. So she eventually formed her own company, Samet Publishing, and Baby ... I Can Hardly Wait! A Pre-Birth and Beyond Diary; a Book of Lists, Tips and Activities appeared last summer.

The book is divided into two-week periods. Each section has a place for a picture of yourself, places to record how you feel, physical changes and the future parents' hopes, thoughts and expectations. There are also tips for each particular stage of pregnancy. Week 12, for instance, suggests starting to wear loose-fitting clothes; Week 22 tells you to start preparing older children for the impending birth; Week 34 tells you to prepare your hospital bag and make a contact list of who to notify; and Week 40, the week of the expected birth very sensibly tells you to accept any offer of help that you get.

Baby ... I Can Hardly Wait! also contains guides to choosing a doctor and recommended Web sites and books.

The book follows the baby through labour and delivery to three months of age. Those who have had children will second Itzkovici-Levy's suggestion to sleep when the baby is sleeping and to make time for you and your partner.

One of the most intriguing suggestions is to make a memory box/time capsule, in which you should put things like the birth announcement, the hospital bracelet, a lock of hair and the annual letter. The book is available in some bookstores. For more information, contact Itzkovici-Levy at her Web site, www.sametpublishing.com, or by e-mail, samet publishing@hotmail.com.

Tiny tyke Tae Kwondo kid likes to bust wooden boards

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Benji Gelbard is a tough little guy with a wicked roundhouse kick and an equally deadly spin hold move.

Although only seven years old, Benji's teeny tiny feet can cause real damage, when provoked. It's best not to get between him and his GameBoy.

Benji can muster enough foot speed and power to break a wooden board with a single, well-executed kick and he's also pretty good at poomse, the highly patterned movements that makes the non-contact version of Tae Kwondo resemble a pugilistic, if stylized, ballet.

Still in Grade 2, Benji is pretty well near the top of his sport following a third place finish in board breaking and a second in poomse at the Arnold Battle of Columbus (Ohio). The Arnold classic, named for Hollywood mega-star Arnold Schwarzenegger, who's broken a few boards – and buildings – in his career, is the largest martial arts competition in North America.

Relying on the form he developed at Chu's Martial Arts academy in Thornhill, Benji competed against youngsters his own age from across the United States and Canada – and defeated most.

In the board-breaking event, athletes completed a routine in which they broke boards, about one-quarter inch thick, at five stations. They were judged on the basis of skill, agility and synchronization.

As far as Benji is concerned, the Columbus competition "was fun because I got third place and I was good in board-breaking." Contacted at a day-care centre, where he spends much of his time when he isn't in school or breaking boards, Benji said he preferred board-breaking to poomse, and that the Columbus event was "exciting."

A boy of few, though well-chosen, words, Benji said: "I want to be the highest...I like beating the other kids."

Benji was introduced to Tae Kwondo by his dad, Claude, who was active in karate at the Bloor Y about 30 years ago.

With three years of training under his belt, Benji has become so adept at the sport that he has been asked to train the club's "tiny tigers," the four to six-year-olds who are just starting out.

"They look up to him" and Benji shows them simple patterns, kicks and blocks, Claude said.

Benji has been training for three years and he currently holds a black belt with a red stripe. In June he'll begin training for a first level black belt.

Benji is at the club three days a week, spending about one hour at a time there. He tacks on another weekly session in advance of competitions. Benji qualified for the Arnold by finishing first in the Battle of Toronto last October, winning both the poomse and board breaking events.

On average, Benji enters a local or regional competition every two months. Next on his agenda is his home club's in-house tournament in April followed by the New York State Open in June.

When he isn't busy practicing Tae Kwondo, Benji likes to play hockey for his house league team. Truth be told, hockey is "funner" than Tae Kwondo and GameBoy is pretty good too.

NHL vet looks beyond rink wars to family life

By CHRIS GARNER
The American Jewish World

ST. PAUL, Minn. — Mathieu Schneider of the Los Angeles Kings, a 13-year veteran of professional hockey who has been playing since he was a boy, should be showing signs of slowing down.

Now with his fifth National Hockey League team (previous stops included Montreal, Toronto, and both New York teams, the Islanders and Rangers), Schneider hopes to settle down in the city of Angels with his wife and son, born two months premature on Dec. 15. Judaism will figure in their family life.

The 31-year-old Schneider, who signed as a free agent with Los Angeles prior to the season, still has what it takes to be a leader on the ice and is a factor in helping his team contend for a playoff spot. He and the struggling Kings came to the Xcel Energy Centre recently to face the Minnesota Wild. They came away with an important 4-0 win.

Schneider has seen a lot of changes in the league since he broke in with the Canadiens in 1989, especially since coming to Los Angeles this year. The trips are longer and the days off less frequent.

"We were pretty much on the road the first two months of the season," Schneider told The American Jewish World from his hotel room in St. Paul the day before his game with the Wild. "It was kinda crazy. It's just always been a part of the game."

The game has been part of Schneider's life for as long as he can remember. He was born in New York City, where his Jewish father saw to it he got every opportunity to become a professional hockey player.

Schneider even went to Mount St. Charles Academy, a prestigious Catholic hockey school in Rhode Island, to further improve his career chances.

"My dad did a good job of always giving me the right people to teach me the game," Schneider said.

Although he didn't have a bar mitzvah, Schneider plans to take Hebrew lessons in the off-season. His wife, whom he met while playing in Toronto, plans to convert to Judaism, as did Schneider's own mother. The couple intend to raise their son as a Jew.

"My dad is very proud of being Jewish," Schneider said. "Over the past few years, it's something I've become more interested in and started reading, trying to learn more about my past. That's led to my wife wanting to convert."

Due to the demands of the job, Schneider hasn't had the time lately to bond with his newborn son. "He's still so young and mom's doing most of the work right now," he said.

No. 10 for the Kings is concentrating on getting his club back into the post-season.

"We definitely have a high talent level, probably the highest I've ever played with," said Schneider, who won a Stanley Cup with Montreal in 1993. "It's just a matter of putting it together at the right time.

"Road trips can be great for a team, especially when you're struggling. Guys spend more time together, eat together and do all those things. It can really jump-start a team."

Schneider entered the game as the King's fifth-leading scorer, with 41 points on 14 goals and 27 assists.

When the Wild went down a man on a penalty for too many men on the ice, Schneider seized the opportunity. Just 26 seconds into the penalty, he hesitated at the point and then slapped a high shot past Minnesota goalie Jamie McLennan for Los Angeles' first goal of the game.

Schneider came back on another Kings power play to assist Luc Robitaille's goal late in the second period, which gave Los Angeles a comfortable 3-0 lead. The Kings added another goal to top the Wild 4-0. Playing alongside fellow defenceman Rob Blake (who was subsequently traded to the Colorado Avalanche), Schneider never left the ice when his team was either on the power play or short-handed.

"We controlled the puck a lot tonight," he said in the locker room. "I like being out there in those situations. I've always considered it a privilege.

"I gotta work hard to be in those situations as well. Tonight, the power play came up really big for us."

ספרותנו

סדר יום: חיי יום-יום בראי ההלכה, מאת: אדם ברוך, הוצאת כתר.

לעתים נדמה שגם בכל האמור בשימוש בשפה העברית חולך ומתעצם הפער התקשורתי בין הקוטב החרדי והקוטב החילוני בישראל. אלה מדברים בשפת ההלכה ואלה מדברים ב"ישראלית" ושני הצדדים סובלים מחרשות, זה לשפת השני. והנה מופיע ספר נדיר חבא לגשר בין הקטבים.

מה סוד הצלחת הספר? כמדומני שסוד ההצלחה טמון בגישה הסובלנית שמחבר מאמץ. כמובן שיש כאן בחירה מפורשת בסוגיות שאכן ניתן להעמידן באור הומניסטי והתעלמות מנושאים שמן הסתם קשה או אי-אפשר יהיה להציגן באור ראציונאלי-מתקדם.

בנוסף להתעלמות מכמה נושאים בעייתיים, מצאתי שאני מתקשה להבין את החלוקה השרירותית בספר לפרקים ונושאים ללא קשר. ואולם המגרעות הן שוליות; הספר נקרא בענין רב והוא מוגש בסגנון מאלף ושובה לב.

חנה אדגים; חנושא: הקב"ה והכיפה וכך כותב אדם ברוך:

"מכתבך, ג.ע., נגע לליבי ואף החזירני לנעוריי, ואענה לך בקיצור רב: מבחינת הקב"ה אין חשיבות לגודל הכיפה שאת סורגת כרגע לידיד שלך, ואף לא לדוגמה שאת בוחרת לכיפה. ואם יש לכל אלה 'חשיבות', הרי היא רק מבחינת הפולקלור הפוליטי-דתי השליט עכשיו בישראל, ואילו הקב"ה מצידו, מה לעשות, כלל אינו מבחין בין האגודה למפד"ל."

About Food

Dear Norene

Joan Kekst's Passover Cookery (Five Star Publications, 168 pp, $37.50) is hot off the press just in time for Passover! It contains an excellent collection of traditional and contemporary recipes, many low-fat, low-cholesterol dishes, plus colour photos. She offers a valuable six-week countdown to Passover and explanations of its customs and symbolic foods.

Did you know that the custom of using a white tablecloth represents the desert sands where the Jews wandered for 40 years? Miriam's cup of water recalls how the prophetess led the women to rejoice after crossing the Red Sea.

Joan will have 35 guests for the first seder and 43 guests the second night. In a recent telephone interview, she said, "No one should be alone for Passover. I invite my family, all of their extended families, my children's friends – everyone is welcome!"

SPINACH MOUSSAKA
(Pareve or dairy)

4 matzah slices
1¼ lb. fresh spinach, stems removed (or 2 pkg. (10 oz.) frozen spinach)
1 medium onion, and 2 garlic cloves, chopped
6 tbsp. vegetable oil
1 lb. chopped mushrooms
2 tbsp. almonds, finely chopped
salt and freshly ground pepper, to taste
2 tsp. lemon juice
1 tbsp. dill leaves, minced
2 tbsp. matzah meal
2 eggs plus 1 egg white
1½ cups mashed potatoes
grated nutmeg

Preheat oven to 400. Grease a 9-in. square pan with 1 tbsp. oil.

Briefly dip matzah slices in water to soften. Drain on paper towels. Fit 2 matzah slices on bottom of pan. Thoroughly drain frozen spinach. Wash fresh spinach; remove stems and cook in salted water for 2 minutes. Drain and chop.

Saute onion and garlic in 2 tbsp. oil until golden; add mushrooms. Cook until mushroom juices evaporate. Season with salt and pepper, add spinach, lemon juice and almonds; remove from heat. Cool. Lightly beat 2 eggs with a pinch of salt; stir into spinach mixture. Adjust flavour and add dill and a bit of matzah meal if needed.

Brush matzah in pan with oil; spread with potatoes. Top with spinach mixture, cover with remaining matzah and brush with oil. Beat egg white with 1 tbsp. oil; add nutmeg and brush on matzah. Bake 50 minutes, baste with remaining egg white and grated nutmeg several times. Bake until top is lightly browned. Serves 6 as a main course.

Note: Add 1 cup Ricotta cheese to spinach mixture for a hearty Passover dairy meal.

New Israelis from the Ukraine seem ready to chomp into the newly baked matzot they received last week at Kfar Chabad. [Israel photo]

Pesach's ultimate purpose

Editorial

Our ancient sages, so wise in the ways of life and so caring towards their people, designed the Pesach Haggadah as a multi-layered experience for every member of the family and for every family and individual in the timeless infinity of Jewish generations.

The two photos on this page are compelling proof of the Haggadah's enchanting power. Cutting across time, dispursing even the molecules of space, it connects the young boys at Kfar Chabad in Israel to the veteran soldiers in Europe some 60 years earlier.

Thus, whether for the youngsters from Ukraine today or for the Canadian servicemen some six decades ago, the Haggadah of Pesach is the triptych for a journey to one of humanity's epochal events. It is the annual pedagogic, mnemonic, literary and choral vehicle that transports us back, as it were, to the excitement and even the dread of the Exodus from Egypt.

As all of us know, during the seder we are obliged, insofar as is humanly possible, to imagine ourselves at the very centre of that Exodus more than 3,000 years ago, leaving our homes in terrible haste, fearful but yearning nevertheless for the new dawn and the new future.

Canadian Jewish servicemen overseas at a seder during World War II. [Canadian Jewish Congress National Archives, Montreal]

That new future which, with God's direction, our forebears created, is re-created every year, countless times a year, when we recall and apply in the details of our everyday lives, Pesach's ultimate purpose: the affirmation of human dignity.

Slavery and tyranny are abhorrent. Freedom and the rule of law are both the prelude and the precondition for humanity's highest responsibility, namely, the responsibility of one for the other.

Pesach's ultimate purpose is the shining light and the dream that drove our forebears forward through the dark night of their escape to freedom. Thus, as we ready ourselves for Pesach, the holiday of re-experiencing the Exodus, we remember, in the words of the Hallel: "God created this day; let us celebrate and be happy in it."

The News in Brief

CANADA

Chabad Sues Town

MONTREAL — A Chabad Lubavitch congregation is taking the Town of Hampstead to court to get a permit to build a synagogue. The 300-member congregation alleges the town effectively froze new construction two weeks after the Chabad group purchased lots for $1.2 million, thus preventing it from erecting a synagogue. A hearing date is set for June 6.

Child Poverty

TORONTO — Organizations working to end child poverty released an open letter to Premier Mike Harris last week asking how the Ontario government plans to use $114 million in new federal funds allocated for children's programs. Those signing the letter included Rabbi Arthur Bielfeld, June Callwood and Gerald Vandezande on behalf of the Campaign Against Child Poverty. Rabbi Bielfeld called on Ontario to match the federal funds in the next provincial budget.

ISRAEL

A Modest Proposal

JERUSALEM — An Orthodox MK has proposed legislation requiring a dress code for civil servants, as well as bank tellers, supermarket cashiers and other clerks who have contact with the public. Shas MK Amnon Cohen said the legislation is aimed at preventing "discomfort" for the Orthodox public caused by what he called "revealing" clothing worn by women.

A Fishy Story

JERUSALEM — Just ahead of Passover, an Israeli food plant has produced what it hopes is the world's largest gefilte fish. Some 22 carp went into making the 50-kilogram chopped fish patty, the Israeli daily Ma'ariv reported.

WORLD

Two Life Terms

LOS ANGELES — Buford Furrow Jr., a white supremacist has been sentenced to two life terms for the 1999 shooting spree here, in which he killed a Filipino American postal worker and wounded five people at a Jewish community centre.

Atrocity Marked

ROME — Italy's president joined government and religious leaders in a ceremony last week marking the anniversary of Italy's worst World War II Nazi atrocity, the mass execution of 335 men and boys at the Ardeatine Caves south of Rome. The 1944 massacre was reprisal for the partisan slaying of 33 German soldiers. Some 75 victims were Jews.

Bar's Name Change

SEOUL — The owner of a Nazi-themed bar here said he will change the bar's name after several protests. With enough money to change only one letter of his sign, the bar will now be known as the Ditler (instead of Hitler) Techno Bar and Cocktail Show. The bar's Nazi symbols will also be removed.

Warsaw Ghetto Film

BRATISLAVA — Filming began in Slovakia for Uprising, a story about the lives of Jews in the Warsaw Ghetto during World War II. Sets depicting Warsaw were built in Bratislava's old town, and the ghetto was recreated near the Danube River. Some 6,500 extras were hired for the movie, which stars Donald Sutherland and David Schwimmer.

Jewish Singles Gather in Budapest

BUDAPEST — They came. They checked each other out. They partied.

That was the agenda for some 500 Jewish singles from around the world who came to Budapest earlier this month to search for love, or just have fun for a weekend.

Some said they found love at first sight. Others came to the March 16-18 "Jewish European Ball" and had fun, but went home empty-handed.

The weekend, which included a traditional Friday night dinner and a walking tour of Jewish Budapest, was the brainchild of two Viennese Jews, Dana Teichner and Ariela Gluck.

Most of the kosher food came from Vienna, but Budapest's famed Gundel Restaurant provided chicken paprikash.

Israel's ambassador to Hungary, Judit Varnai Shorer, endorsed the idea of bringing young Jews together, telling ball participants that the event "demonstrates the awakening of Judaism and Zionism in Europe."

Most attendees came from England, Germany, the United States and Canada, with some from as far as South Africa and Australia.

Israel will win war against Palestinians: Netanyahu

Accuses Arafat of aggression

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — The Palestinian Authority has declared war on Israel, but Israel will fight back and win, Benjamin Netanyahu said at a community rally last week.

In a rousing, finger-pointing speech that elicited cheers and applause from a packed house at the Sephardic Kehila Centre, Israel's former prime minister accused PA President Yasser Arafat of aggression and a thinly-veiled desire to eradicate Israel.

"Arafat has declared war on the Jewish state," said Netanyahu in an allusion to the spate of Palestinian violence that has gripped Israel and the disputed territories for the past six months. "He will lose that war."

Netanyahu, defeated by Ehud Barak in the 1999 general election after three years in office, contrasted Israel's yearning for peace with what he called Arafat's phased plan for its ultimate destruction.

"The Palestinians are not interested in peace," but in driving Israel into the sea, he charged.

"Arafat wants peace with no Israel," he added, saying his true goal became apparent after rejecting Barak's "unimaginable concessions" at last summer's Camp David summit and insisting on the right of Palestinian refugees to return to their former homes in Israel.

If Israel's conflict with the Palestinians had been solely territorial, he went on to say, it could have been solved long ago.

Blasting the PA for launching what he described as a war of snipers and suicide bombers against Israel, Netanyahu said that Arafat's real intention is to destroy Israel bit by bit in a battle of phases.

"To Arafat, Jaffa and Haifa are part of Palestine."

In a self-congratulatory note, Netanyahu voiced satisfaction for having stopped "the head-long rush" to Israel's pre-1967 borders.

Benjamin Netanyahu

At a press conference preceding his public appearance, he said he relinquished only two percent of the West Bank to the PA. By contrast, the previous Israeli government handed over much more land.

Claiming that the 1993 Oslo accords gave Arafat a foothold in the West Bank and thereby enhanced his objective of extirpating Israel, Netanyahu said Israelis now understand his true intentions.

"Israelis are not suckers. We have a renewed unity," he said, referring to Israel's newly-formed national unity government.

Warning Arafat that Israel intends to respond forcefully to Palestinian terrorism, he expressed confidence that Prime Minister Ariel Sharon will "take the necessary steps to restore security."

Terrorism can be "rolled back" with a policy of firmness, he said, throwing his full support behind Sharon, a political rival.

Turning to a related topic, he cautioned that Israel can only expect a "cold peace" from its Arab neighbours.

Embodied in Hatikvah

From the editor's desk

The words "last century" resonate with a sense of distance that belie the fact it ended only 16 months ago.

For much of today' s youth, however, the last century might just as well be ancient centuries. The sense of remove is palpable, a demarcation of time that becomes an impasse, a wall that many youngsters do not know how or even whether to scale.

But we, the older generation, know that time, like familiar bookmarks, merely tells us where to find things. It need not – and for Jews, it dare not – be a wall dividing one generation from the next.

Thus, it falls to us to teach our children where and why to look for pieces of our past.

As events unfold today in the Middle East, and Israel finds itself increasingly under siege, it is more vital than ever that our children search through the misery and miracle-laden history of the last century for pieces of pride and of inspiration in Israel's heroic past.

We pray they find some of those pieces. Indeed, it is our urgent need that they do so as much as it is Israel's.

What follows is a piece of the memory of what Israel meant to a man whose entire life was lived in the last century and whose fate it was to be the only survivor of a large family destroyed by the Nazis.

Even in the small village of Bodzentin in southeast Poland where the young apprentice tailor was born and raised, the shaliach from Eretz Yisrael visited regularly. What was remarkable to the young man, now 16 years old and shaving every few days, and to the shaliach as well, was the fact that his parents, devout, chassidic Jews of the "old world," encouraged their fair-skinned, gentle boy to become involved with the shaliach in his energetic, idealistic group of young Poalei Zion.

The boy's involvement lasted more than five years. Over time, the handful of youngsters from Bodzentin joined a larger group in Shtarszitz, near Viersbjenik, and formed a kibbutz.

It was a kibbutz of hachsharah, of training toward the day the young men and women would leave the grey skies of Poland for the deep blue horizon of Palestine. (In those days, Palestine was understood by the entire world to be the place where Jews were returning, and "Palestinians" was the name given by the entire world to those returning Jews.)

The boy lived on that kibbutz for almost a year. His tailoring abilities were part of the co-operative of skills that were pooled for commercial gain among the pioneers-in-training. The group assiduously followed the news of Eretz Yisrael, learned Hebrew and argued over politics.

But the idyl of the boy's training and the ideal of an imminent aliyah to Palestine were shattered by the conscription notice that came to his family. In 1937, just prior to sundown on the night of Kol Nidrei, the young Jew from Bodzentin, by now an accomplished tailor and nearly fluent in Hebrew, presented himself to the induction centre of the Polish army in Jaroslav. After that night he would see his parents, sisters and brother only briefly, two more times.

Barely two years later, the Polish army had collapsed against the onslaught of the Nazis. Along with thousands of other fleeing Poles, the young soldier/tailor fled eastward toward the Russian border.

After some months of wandering from one community to another, he was assigned to a camp in Siberia, part of a work detail felling trees for the Soviet war effort. Living conditions were primitive; sanitary conditions utterly abhorrent. He complained to the commissar who ran the camp.

That night, three policemen from the NKVD arrested the young Jew and took him away for interrogation. His interrogators decided that their young Jewish prisoner was a "Zionist spy" and his father a wealthy businessman. Proof of the charge would materialize in the confession they expected the prisoner to sign.

But the Jew signed no document and acceded to no charge. Every night for six months the former pioneer-in-training was questioned by the police, but they could not exact an admission that he was a Zionist spy. Without the admission, the court was able to convict the accused only of a lesser mischief-related charge and fine him 75 rubles.

Eventually, out of the chaos and ubiquitous horror of World War II, the tailor rebuilt his life in Canada. But not one single day of the remainder of his life was without the stirring of images or the comfort of memories of the family he last saw in 1939 or of the dreams he shared with his friends on the kibbutz in Shtarszitz.

From then on, every seder he conducted with his children and grandchildren in the ripening spring and pale cyan skies of Toronto would end with his singing Hatikvah. The fellowship, common cause and common destiny inspired by the melody and words of the anthem were somehow a balm to the torments his soul could only partially heal.

For the former pioneer-in-training, the elemental significance of the vast inexplicability of the events of the last century was embodied in Hatikvah. And there was no more appropriate moment than at the Pesach seder in which to teach that to his children.

Zundel case considered to be a victory: CHRC

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — To present Ernst Zundel as a Holocaust denier would be a grotesque misinterpretation, says the deputy attorney-general of Ontario and lead counsel for the Canadian Human Rights Commission (CHRC).

"One of our goals [in the case against Zundel] was to demonstrate that this was not historical research, this was not debate, this was straight anti-Semitism, identical to the anti-Semitism that has gone on since the Middle Ages," said Mark Freiman, speaking at a recent regional executive and council meeting of Canadian Jewish Congress Ontario region.

Freiman's thesis to the tribunal, he said, was that the case was one of Holocaust justification, "and it always will be."

The general public does not know a lot about Zundel, said Freiman, because the Canadian Human Rights Commission adopted the strategy of not attracting a lot of media attention or publicity to the case.

"We believe this is the correct [approach] because the media give criminals like Ernst Zundel proliferation of their views.

"We tried to work quietly to cut off what is really important to him – his platform to the world. He tried on numerous occasions to use the proceedings to attract attention, to use it as a way of publicizing his views," Freiman said.

The proceedings against Zundel were not criminal proceedings, he said, and the only remedy available to them was a cease and desist order. "This order means Zundel must stop using the Internet to air his views. If he fails to stop, a further remedy would be to hold contempt proceedings in a federal court which could result in a jail term."

Regardless of the outcome – "we are still waiting for a decision," he said – "we believe we have already won, because as of Jan. 1, Zundel has fled the jurisdiction, and is now living in Tennessee."

Zundel, who was denied Canadian citizenship, also has a warrant out for his arrest in Germany, Freiman said, because of his violation of the anti-hate laws in that country.

"When he was first charged in Germany he went there, but fled after two or three days. His greatest fear is that he will be deported back to Germany, and a criminal conviction in Canada could lead to deportation."

Rather than facing that, and rather than stopping his communication on the Internet, he said, "Zundel left the jurisdiction, and we consider it to be a major victory. We are rid of him."

In the next three or four months, said Freiman, "We will have a decision that will provide the people of Canada with a powerful weapon to inhibit hate on the Internet. [We will be sending] a powerful message about what will and will not be tolerated in a multinational and multicultural country such as Canada."

Also at the meeting, Tara Zieleman, a student at Erindale Secondary School in Mississauga, was presented with the 2001 Senpo Sugihara Humanitarian Award.

The award, granted to youth ages 13 to 18 for their work in the area of anti-racism or for an outstanding act of humanitarianism, was developed by the National Association of Japanese Canadians Toronto chapter, and CJC, Ontario region, to honour the memory of Sugihara.

Sugihara, Japan's consul in Kovno Lithuania during the Holocaust, independently issued travel visas to Polish Jewish refugees, which allowed as many as 6,000 men, women and children to flee the country.

Zieleman has volunteered at Foodpath and at various homes for the aged. She is a member of the North American Federation Youth and has been a Hebrew tutor for the last five years. She is also active in a youth program that runs a camp for underprivileged inner-city children from Canada and the United States. Paula Draper, a member of the CJC Ontario region executive, said that in addition to Zieleman's volunteer work, she has supported herself, with no help from parents, for nearly three years.

It was announced at the meeting that Keith Landy has been acclaimed incoming national president, Ed Morgan has been acclaimed chair of Ontario region, and Harold Brief has been acclaimed national vice-president, Ontario region.

Kallah program hosts Wiesel

By ANNA MORGAN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — When it comes to the Holocaust, Elie Wiesel has only questions, not answers.

In a country as civilized as Germany, it is impossible to understand why so many co-operated with Hitler's attempt to exterminate the Jews, Wiesel told thousands of people in a live broadcast of the Kallah program.

Over the past month, the program joined New York's 92nd Street Y with 31 North American Jewish community centres, including the Bathurst JCC and the Bloor JCC, in three different evenings of interactive Jewish learning.

In the final evening, Rabbi David Woznica hosted A Conversation With Elie Wiesel in New York. Prof. Sara Horowitz from York University's centre for Jewish studies gave an introduction to the evening in Toronto.

Wiesel, who won a Nobel Peace Prize in 1986, is known for his many literary works on the Holocaust, including Night and A Beggar in Jerusalem.

"Night is the most well read book about the Holocaust today," Horowitz said.

"When Wiesel initially published his book in the '50s, there were very few dialogues about the Holocaust.

"It wasn't a common topic of conversation. Some people talked about it with their families, and some chose not to. It wasn't a matter of public discourse the way it is now," Horowitz said.

"In that sense, Night was a very creative act. Wiesel was one of the people who helped bring the Holocaust to the eyes of people who weren't particularly interested in thinking about it."

Wiesel himself recalled that "for many years, Night was the book that people read but didn't buy, and when A Beggar in Jerusalem won a prestigious French literary award, it became the book that everyone bought but didn't read."

Wiesel, who traces his lineage to Rashi, the 11th-century French biblical commentator, recently published his two-part memoirs, All Rivers Run to the Sea and The Sea is Never Full, Horowitz noted.

"My concern now," Wiesel said, "is not that the Holocaust will be forgotten. It is the single most documented event in history."

Wiesel's worry is that "the tragedy has become so popular that everyone wants a part of it and that the Holocaust will be trivialized, commercialized and universalized.

"Children of survivors have a privileged and special position," Wiesel added, "because Hitler wanted these children dead.

"When I meet children of survivors, there is always a bond – things we have in common. For example, we cry very easily and we're not sure why."

And there is a special relationship between survivors and their children, he said. "At weddings you see their tears and these are the tears of God."

You often see that children of survivors want to protect their parents, and survivors want to protect their children, and between them lies a huge barrier of silence, he said.

"Elie Wiesel is, and has been, a human rights activist," Horowitz noted, "because he believes that survivors have a special sensitivity and a special obligation to deal with oppression. He has often confronted world leaders on issues where he thought they failed morally.

"What Wiesel had done is what we all know from our own private lives and encounters… that to learn about the Holocaust, and to know about the Holocaust and to think about it is to engage in the world and to think about contemporary issues."

Today, the only picture Wiesel has in his home in Boston is on his desk, Rabbi Woznica noted, and it is of the house in Sighet, Romania where he was born.

"It is always important that you know where you come from," Wiesel said. "I measure everything against that."

Backwards in time, forwards in hope

Throughout the Jewish world, Saturday night, motza'ei Shabbat, we will gather in our homes with family and friends for the Passover seder. Yet even as we anticipate the festivity and sense of joy that must permeate the evening and the recitation of the Hagaddah, we cannot help but sigh in eerie disbelief and spectral sadness at the developments in the Middle East. As if the pages of the calendar of half a century ago or more had been restored, we again see images and hear pronouncements that we had hoped were consigned to a vanished past.

At the Arab Summit meeting in Amman, the president of Syria, Western-educated, presumed democracy-supporting, Bashar al-Assad, delivered the following remarks about Israel: "We say the head of the government is a racist; it's a racist government, a racist army and security force... It is a racist society and it is even more racist than the Nazis."

At the same summit Izzat Ibrahim, Iraq's representative read his leader's speech. Saddam Hussein, increasingly a presumed darling of the Arab world, did not attend the summit himself. He was either too sick or too proud to do so. He concluded his remarks, all of which were focused on his people's avowed willingness to "liberate Palestine," with the following invocation: "May God damn the Jews!"

Palestinian snipers trained the cross hairs of their powerful weapons on a 10-month-old baby and casually blasted the baby's brains out. Palestinian religious leaders sent youngsters to die violently and horribly, bombs strapped to their chests, under inviolate orders to commit suicide and kill Jews. And Palestinian political leaders took their own people further away from the possibility of peace with Israel by their continued embrace of and incitement to more violence.

In an article in the Lebanese newspaper, Al-Safir, Faisal Husseini, one of the presumed "moderates" among the Palestinian establishment and a minister in the PA, made plain his ideas regarding Israel: "There is a certain delicate thinking that must be understood by all. I may be obliged to have contacts with Sharon's government in order to achieve some of the vital needs of our people. But this is not to justify opening relations with Israel by other [Arab states]. I am maintaining contact in order to put an end to the relationship... There is a difference between the strategic goal of the Palestinian people, who are not willing to give up even one grain of Palestinian soil, and the political [tactical] effort that has to do with the [present] balance of power and with the nature of the present international system. The latter is a different effort than the former. We may lose or win [tactically] but our eyes will continue to aspire to the strategic goal, namely, to Palestine from the river to the sea. (Our emphasis.) Whatever we get now cannot make us forget this supreme truth."

Hatred of Israel, hatred of Jews, shamelessly occupies the Arab world.

They have stepped backwards in time. But our response must be as it has always been: to move constantly forward, resolutely, with hope.

Personal gain not Opdyke's motive

Ron Csillag's article "Righteous Gentile is thankful God chose her" in The CJN, March 29 may have left an inappropriate impression about Irene Gut Opdyke.

The article stated that Gut Opdyke was in Toronto to promote the softcover version of her book dealing with her experiences during the Holocaust, when she saved the lives of over a dozen Jews. Readers may have inferred that Gut Opdyke came to Toronto for personal gain. Nothing could be further from the truth.

She was brought to Toronto by the organizers of the March of the Living program, which is sponsored by the UJA FEDERATION of Greater Toronto and UIA Federations Canada. Gut Opdyke came to share her story with March of the Living participants and the students of several schools. She also spoke at the Shaarei Shomayim Synagogue.

An honorary Lion of Judah and an honoree Righteous Among the Nations, this outstanding woman feels that her story is so important to share that all she requested was to have her airfare from Los Angeles paid for. She also wanted hugs from the students who lined up to speak to her at the end of the program.

Her presentation has been one of the highlights of our preparation for the march next year.

Mendacity in the media

As a steadfast Jewish peacenik, I am shocked and appalled by the world's media, its pundits and its spin doctors.

Several months ago in the Middle East, a young Palestinian boy was tragically caught in a crossfire and shot to death at his father's side.

For days, a debate raged on about whether this was a convincing instance of abuse or excessive use of power by Israel, and if it demonstrated a callous disregard for the lives of Palestinians. The point was whether the events revealed a hypocritical Jewish and Israeli mentality in their preaching of peace while practicing war.

Last week, another incident in which an executioner surgically assassinated a baby in her mother's arms, left very little room for debate.

Some days later, at an Arab summit in Amman, Arab leaders once again demonstrated they cannot agree on anything except Israel and that, whatever the facts, Jews and Israelis are the villains. Those brave Palestinian commanders and parents who send their children on suicidal missions to kill Jewish children at bus stops are truly and genuinely the champions of peace; Israelis should embrace them with open arms as trusted friends and neighbours when they come to live in the streets of Haifa and Tel Aviv.

The media has always ignored such statements and denied having a double standard on the Middle East. The only alternative explanation to such reporting is mendacity.

Cultural vandalism must stop

The article "The dangers extremists pose" (CJN, March 22) rightly condemned the Taliban's despicable destruction of historic cultural artifacts. Particularly apt was the note taken of past Islamic destructive acts against the Jewish holy places Joseph's Tomb, Jerusalem's Jewish Quarter synagogues and Mount of Olives cemetery.

Though these events are long in the past, the destruction continues even today and on the Temple Mount itself. For months, the Muslim Wakf has been conducting illegal, highly destructive excavations there. Where archaeologists would use tiny trowels, the Wakf has employed earth-moving equipment. Priceless First and Second Temple artifacts have been unceremoniously dumped out with an estimated 1,500 tons of removed earth. The reason is obvious: to remove any traces of the Jewish presence there.

This appalling cultural vandalism must not be permitted. There needs to be worldwide public protest like that directed – unfortunately unsuccessfully – at the Taliban, before it is too late.

Fellow believers share thoughts

My compliments to your guest contributor, William Bedford, for his excellent presentation of the history of Christian-Jewish relations in "Apologizing? That's the easy part" (CJN, March 22).

Seeing the outline of these experiences in such a direct and concise form gives us a perspective on the past which should help us in the future. Jewish people tend to be very uneasy in their relationships with Christians, and the average Christian today doesn't really understand why. Articles like this can be useful in sharing our thinking with our fellow believers.

Israel's secret weapons

The purpose of the Pesach seder is to enable us to feel as if we ourselves were actually leaving behind slavery in Egypt. The mitzvah of vehigadita lebincha requires us to explain the events of the Exodus to our children to bring them somehow closer to this feeling. As Ilan Rubin relates in this poignant essay, an innovative new program in Israeli schools seeks to do exactly this for the modern-day Exodus.

By ILAN RUBIN
Special to The CJN

It is Yom Hamishpachah (Family Day) in our small neighbourhood school in Jerusalem. Cynthia and I have come to the class, along with many other parents, to be with our daughter and her Grade Six fellow pupils for a special event.

Each child has been asked a few weeks earlier to consult with his or her parents and bring one item that has special significance for his or her family.

Now all the items are collected in a half-opened suitcase at the front of the class, the teacher pulling them out at random, and the parents (or children) explaining its significance.

"These simple tin candlesticks came with my grandmother when she fled Galicia for Vienna right after World War I," explains Liora's mother. "In 1939, when my mother fled to England, she was unable to take anything valuable out of the country, and so she took with her these candlesticks as a memory of her home and her Jewish roots.

"When she and my father moved to Canada after World War II, they had become our family's most cherished heirloom. When I made aliyah almost thirty years ago, my mother gave them to me, saying: 'Let them come home with you.'"

Amit is next. "This Hamsa has been reputed to have been in our family in Morocco for 22 generations [since the Expulsion from Spain]. When my grandparents made the difficult journey to Eretz Yisrael, it was only natural that they should bring it along, and it hangs in a prominent place in our house in Musrara ever since."

"This Haggadah was printed in Baghdad in 1896," Ofrah, the class teacher, says. "See how it was repaired with simple newsprint, such was the poverty of those days! When my grandfather was thrown into jail for Zionist activity, he took this Haggadah along. He handed it down to my late father as a precious link between the kisufim [yearnings] in the Diaspora for Zion and our life in Israel. For years, even when we were inundated with beautiful, richly illustrated Haggadot, my father insisted on using this one for the seder. 'So that we remember where we came from, and why we're here,' he used to say."

Next to come out of the suitcase is a small, vinyl-bound siddur. "My grandfather asked me to buy myself a siddur before I went off to milu'im [reserve duty] in Lebanon in the early '80s," says Dani's father. "Saba said that in his father's house in Poland, no Jewish adult would ever leave home without a siddur. Because he got out of Europe by the skin of his teeth, there was no family siddur that he could give me.

"During milu'im, with this siddur in my pocket, I had a very close scrape with death, and suddenly I saw the connection between my family here and there, Jewish tradition, and what we are doing in our return to the Land," he explains. "It's never left my side since."

"Three photos," announces Michal's mother. She points to one picture. "This is me as a little girl in Romania with my mother and father. See how serious and meso'odar [orderly] we look. And here is me with my friends in Israel, in our ma'abara [temporary shacks for olim in the fifties]. How relaxed I look, and how happy, even though we had practically nothing. And here is a picture of one of Michal's birthday parties. How similar she looks to the picture of me as a child, and yet how different!"

"Here's me," announces Aviva's father, holding up another photograph. "I'm 3 years old, and I'm holding the New York newspaper announcing the vote in the UN in 1948. When I made aliyah 25 years later, I had the exhilirating feeling that I had closed a circle."

"My grandmother was a chalutzah from Germany, the oldest daughter," says Re'ut's mother. "When she left her home in the '30s, she refused to take anything with her from the Old Country. Her mother gave her this necklace, as a present 'for being born anew in Israel.' Bubbe gave my mother this necklace when she gave birth to me, and I will give this necklace to Re'ut when she gives birth to her oldest daughter!"

And so it continues: each family with its special link back into the past. And the tattered suitcase from which all these items had been taken?

"When we got permission to leave Russia, we had no money to spare on fancy luggage," says Ilana's father. "When we got here, we thought we'd just throw it out. But we decided to keep it to remind the kids and ourselves from where we came from, and why we're happy to be home."

The children reclaim their family heirlooms with reverence: for many, it's the first time that they have heard the stories. Everyone in that class knows that something deep is happening in the morning's chevrutah. Through the simple yet powerful modality of family memorabilia, we are being reminded of the vital link between the Tekuma (rebirth of Israel) and between the homecoming of each and every Jewish family living here, and of the personal Zionist imperative that grandparents and their grandparents have passed on to us from unmarked graves.

This Veshinantam Le'Vanecha Program, run by the Frankel Center for Jewish Family Education, has been reaching out for the past two years to children and their parents all over the country. From mantelpieces and living room shelves throughout Israel come these heirlooms and their stories. And, perhaps even more poignantly, because of this program, these items are being brought back from the boidems and intersols, after years of neglect, into the narrative of the family, and its connection to the Land.

The post-Zionist debunkers at home, and the prophets of gloom and doom from abroad think that they can understand the Israeli soul by reading our newspapers. But if they haven't attended a Yom Hamishpacha recently, then they will never be aware of the ongoing depth and quiet tenacity of our individual and familial commitment to our Homeland.

Ilan Rubin, a former Canadian, now lives in Jerusalem. He is the secretary general of the Jewish Agency for Israel.

A new dimension of love

Anyone who goes to shul, even a minimum number of times, is familiar with the Hebrew word Ve'ahavta, "You shall love." The word occurs three times in the Torah, once in reference to God (You shall love the Lord your God...), and twice in reference to a stranger whom we are to love like ourselves – a command that most readers find difficult to observe.

Rabbi Gunther Plaut in Toronto

Yet there are some in our community who take this command very seriously and extend the mitzvah of loving a stranger not only to those living in our own land, but even to those far away. The unusual group of those who have made this extension a primary part of their striving calls itself Ve'ahavta.

Headquartered in a tiny office in the centre of Toronto, it is the engine for a remarkable show of love and care. An earthquake in San Salvador or hunger in Zimbabwe will energize the organization to send a team there in order to provide some help, relief and love. But strangers may indeed be closer to home, and every night, one of Ve'ahavta's vans cruises the streets of Toronto looking for homeless people sleeping in a doorway or under a bridge, offering them clothing and sustenance.

I visited their office recently and came away inspired. This morning as I write this column, an e-mail message arrives from that group that says, "Our work in Zimbabwe is moving ahead. We just had the Nevaripine side of our study accepted. This means we will compare the short regime of AZT to a short regime of Nevaripine, a cancer drug found to be effective with AIDS. We could uncover a cheap, affordable way of saving millions of babies.

"Locally, our mobile 'Jewish Response to the Homeless' is going well. We have put together some specialty nights for rabbis, politicians, entertainers, etc."

I, too, hope to go with them one of these nights.

Needless to say, whenever something original and different happens, there are skeptics and detractors as well as supporters. "Why do they have to worry about others, when so many of our own need care?" is one critique. It comes primarily from those who consider Jews to be living in a beleaguered fortress: We are within, others are without. Hence, we care for our own and only them; let the rest of the world care for itself.

I consider Ve'ahavta – with its memorable Hebrew title – a truly Jewishly-inspired moral engine. Their love knows no boundary and certainly includes our own, but it does not stop there. Anyone who is interested can enquire from its founder and leader, Avrum Rosensweig, who can be reached by e-mail at avrum@globalserve.net. If you do get on their mailing list, you will be impressed by this unusual group of people who take their religion very seriously indeed.

Chag sameach!

Advocacy at home – our own challenge

The tenor of Israel advocacy has changed dramatically over the last six months. As the intifadah appears to have become a routine, negative aspect of Israeli life, the community's response is characterized by discomfort and frustration with what is described as a renewed assault on Israel in the media.

Shira Herzog in Toronto

The current crisis raises old images of Israel under siege on the one hand, and of the Goliath using excessive force on the other hand. Hostile UN resolutions attempt to delegitimize Israel, and it seems that the forces of virulent anti-Israel rhetoric have once again been unleashed. Outside of a small circle of community leadership, we pay insufficient attention to the details of our own government's policy, and we focus relentlessly on the events over which we have no control – in the Middle East.

The contrast to the previous decade has contributed to this inchoate sense of malaise. If Oslo meant that reason might prevail, and that the Israel-Palestinian conflict could perhaps be resolved by negotiations that fit into a western frame of reference, the intifadah meant that these rules could not be applied, and that Israelis and Palestinian might be doomed to an interminable cycle of violence. For many, Ariel Sharon's election as prime minister only reinforced this sense of pessimism.

But so much has, in fact, changed. Israel is stronger than ever before, with a vibrant economy. The high-tech sector remains robust, and foreign investment continues to flow into it, subject to world economic cycles of bull and bear markets. Israel's democracy may play by rules that are different than ours, but it is open, accountable, and flawed – like any other.

Sharon's election was a reflection of a desire for change and a firm hand today, rather than a long-term swerve to the right and renewed hawkishness. And as prime minister, he is demonstrating a pragmatism that belies the stereotype of the reckless general of old.

Maybe it is time to internalize the reality of a society that struggles to define appropriate norms of conduct in an imperfect world, that is bound to make mistakes, and that has to be judged not just by whether the mistakes are made, but by how they are dealt with. And maybe it is time to realize that criticism of that society is bound to exist, and that the measure of support has to be looked at over time rather than from one television image to the next.

Maybe it is time to focus on our domestic environment, where we can actually have some limited influence. We function from a position of strength in the Canadian political environment, but seem disinterested in using it effectively. It takes an effort to understand how Canadian policy is made, but what Canada says about an international observer force in the territories, or about the Palestinian right of return does indeed matter.

Canada has the opportunity to speak out at meetings of the UN Commission on Human Rights on abusive treatment of Israel, and it will be able to play a leading role at the World Conference Against Racism next summer.

Our government is not instinctively drawn to an active engagement in the foreign policy arena, but the fundamental principles of its approach to the Middle East conflict, which we have always supported, are the background against which we make the case for constructive intervention in such issues. They may seem esoteric when juxtaposed against the television images of today or tomorrow, but they count. More importantly, we can have a lot more input into them than we can into what CNN photographers shoot in Ramallah.

We need a renewed passion for our own Canada-Israel agenda that can motivate us to do all we can to ensure a supportive environment for Israel, even as we need a rational understanding of the limits of our ability to shape events that are often uncomfortable. Every person who has gone on a community mission to Israel should become not only an internal advocate to friends in the community, but should know how to communicate that message effectively to a wider circle of friends and colleagues. On our own domestic front, every voice and vote does count. We should ensure that they are used wisely.

The spirit and letter of Passover

Passover is always a special time, the seders most of all.

This year the holiday will be celebrated with a vengeance, since the two seders fall on a weekend. There are fewer excuses for families not coming in from out of town, or for not going to synagogue. In Montreal, the traffic in Jewish neighbourhoods will be clogged with cars, many, alas, with Ontario licence plates, as children come back to visit parents and grandparents. Already the supermarkets in these areas are groaning under the weight of huge supplies of Passover products.

Morton Weinfeld in Montreal

Like all holidays, Passover includes two dimensions: the spirit and the letter of the occasion. My family takes Passover seriously. Though we are not Orthodox, we keep kosher in the home, more or less. At Passover, we exchange our regular two sets of dishes for two sets of Passover dishes, including all manner of pots, pans and blenders. We scrub kitchen shelves meticulously. We get rid of all foods that are not pesadik.

For eight days, we eat only products labelled as "kosher for Passover" in our home. Like many Jews, I sometimes wonder about whether the higher prices for these foods really reflect the cost of production, or include an extra mark-up levied by kosher oligopolies on a captive consumer market. Oh well, being Jewish is not cheap.

The phrase "kosher for Passover" now means many things. For those who are perplexed, the Jewish Community Council of Montreal, or Vaad Ha'ir, publishes a handy guide every Passover as a special issue of Voice of the Vaad. From it I learned that our home still falls below a 100 percent level of Passover kashrut.

The guide contains many useful bits of information. For example, if new dishes are unavailable, there are five different methods of "kashering" utensils. The easiest is immersing a dish in boiling hot water; the most challenging is soaking a dish with cold water for three days and changing the water every 24 hours. Little did I know that all manner of medications, as well as cleansing and makeup products, also require scrutiny. Luckily, the Vaad's publication provides a detailed list.

Observing the letter of the law is a growing business. Montreal's Vaad, which regulates kashrut in the city, now employs 80 full-time and 24 part-time mashgichim, or kashrut inspectors, and recently purchased a new building. In the past two years, 55 new companies have been certified.

Nowhere is the explosion in kashrut more apparent than in the unprecedented variety and sophistication of Passover products. Take matzah. I recall the days when matzah was matzah rather than a gourmet product. It certainly was a difficult and acquired taste, befitting the "bread of affliction" which it symbolized. Today there are countless varieties of matzah to suit every taste: chocolate, onion, egg, garlic, whole wheat, etc.

But that is just the beginning. I also recall when desserts on Passover consisted of macaroons, and those revolting jellied candies. Yecch! But no more. Jewish ingeunity has applied itself to making Passover products which taste almost exactly like regular fare. Kosher for Passover rolls mimic the taste of bread, there are cakes of every sort – my favourite is Osem's chocolate chip cake – as well as cookies, pastries – you name it.

Yet I cannot help but feel that somehow these new and upscale Passover products dilute the spirit and central events of the story. The liberation from bondage in Egypt, the wandering for 40 years in the desert, the embarce of the Ten Commandments, the settling of the land of Israel: these are the essence of yitziat Mitzrayim.

What saves the holiday is the seder, and specifically, the Haggadah. Most seders include in their proceedings some element of the telling of the story, whether in the original Hebrew, English, French, Russian, or any other language. All the rituals we observe, as well as the text itself, remind us of why the holiday is taking place. Many families will add their own custom or readings, usually designed to enhance the message. Given the current travails being experienced in Israel, the chant "next year in Jerusalem" has added significance.

No matter how we relish the heaping plates of food, no matter how we enjoy the company of family and friends on the seder night, and no matter how scrupulously we observe the Passover dietary laws, we ought not forget the holiday's basic themes. Jews have a common historical origin, a common religious heritage, and a common purpose which includes a commitment to freedom, security, and Torah.

Chag sameach.

Palestinians must give up refugee demand

It is clear, now more than ever, that the Oslo peace process foundered on the rocks of the incendiary Palestinian refugee issue.

Stripped to its bare essentials, the peace talks collapsed in a welter of mutual recriminations mainly because the Palestinians left no real wiggle room for meaningful compromise on the refugees.

Sheldon Kirshner in Toronto

And while it is true that the question of sovereignty in eastern Jerusalem and the Temple Mount emerged as one of the chief roadblocks on the rocky road toward conflict resolution, the ultimate dealbreaker was the refugee issue, spawned by the 1948 Arab-Israeli war.

Ehud Barak, the former Israeli prime minister, suggested that a solution, no matter how convoluted and layered, was attainable in Jerusalem. But he was stymied by the Palestinian refugee conundrum. Barak's family reunification plan, which would have permitted the phased entry of upwards of 100,000 refugees into Israel, was roundly rejected by the Palestinian leadership, led by Yasser Arafat. Partly as a result of this development, the peace process all but collapsed.

On Dec. 25, 2000, three months into the second Palestinian uprising, Bill Clinton, the outgoing U.S. president, made a desperate, last-ditch attempt to revive Oslo.

The initiative, whose objective was an historic end-of-conflict agreement that might have been sealed had Arafat consented, was anchored by two key elements. Israel would cede sovereignty over the Temple Mount, in exchange for which the Palestinians would give up on the "right of return," the freedom of their refugees to go back to their former homes in Israel.

Responding to Clinton's ambitious overture, Barak announced that he would be "compelled" to accept these proposals if Arafat also embraced them. The Palestinians, however, were not ready to co-operate, insisting that the right of return could not be watered down by compromise.

The consequences were resounding. Clinton's far-reaching initiative, the last chance for peace in the immediate future, died stillborn. The spark of the intifadah was reignited, precipitating yet more casualties among Israelis and Arabs. Ariel Sharon soundly defeated Barak in a special prime ministerial election in which the overarching themes were security – or lack thereof – and terrorism.

Reflecting on the Palestinians' refusal to deal realistically with the refugees, Clinton, in a parting shot, declared: "We cannot expect Israel to make a decision that would threaten [its] very foundations and would undermine the whole logic of peace."

Clinton, whose grasp of the Arab-Israeli dispute was acute, thereby cut to the core of the problem. If territorial partition – the basis of last summer's Camp David summit and the architecture of Oslo's structure – was to be the fulcrum of a lasting peace accord, the Palestinians would have to jettison their obsession with fulfilling the rigid requirements of the right of return.

Clearly, unless it turns suicidal, Israel cannot allow itself to be swamped by three to four million Palestinian refugees, which includes displaced Palestinians and their progeny. The idea is not only wildly impractical, but insidious, a demographic timebomb that would imperil Israel's very existence as a Jewish state. As Gamal Abdel Nasser, the late president of Egypt, put it: "If the refugees return to Israel, Israel will cease to exist."

It is as simple as that.

The Palestinians, to this day, claim that they do not really wish to exercise the right of return, realizing it is a non-starter. They merely want Israel to accept the principle.

It is a disengenuous argument. If the principle is established and enshrined, Israel will find itself on a slippery slope, sliding perilously and inexorably toward extinction. With the passage of time, Israel would be demographically transformed into a secular or binational state – the goal of Palestinian radicals. Through stealth, rather than armed struggle, the Palestinians would achieve victory.

Although the pragmatic wing of the Palestinian movement understands that no Israeli government – left, right or centre – can, should or will be flexible on the right of return, the Palestinians, myopically, continue to insist that it cannot be forsaken.

"The refugee issue goes to the very heart of the Israeli-Palestinian conflict and is central to its resolution," wrote Mouin Rabbani in a recent edition of Middle East International.

"The right of Palestinian refugees to return is an inalienable, individual, human and collective right," observed Arjan El-Fassed in The Toronto Star.

Far from being confined to Palestinian circles, such intransigent views have been incorporated into the political rhetoric of Arab leaders. At a meeting in Cairo in January, Arab foreign ministers, taking their lead from the Palestinians, characterized the right of return as "sacred."

In an effort to sugarcoat the right of return, Palestinian writers contend that Israel is physically capable of absorbing several million Arab refugees. As Rabbani stated: "It recently found room for over a million immigrants from the Soviet Union and would not hesitate to absorb double that number of American Jews today."

Still other Palestinian theoreticians refer to studies purportedly showing that 78 percent of Israelis currently live on only 14 percent of the land.

They miss the point.

Israel is a sovereign state and has the manifest right, like all independent nations, to determine its immigration policy and its ethnic, religious and cultural composition. If Israel wants to be a Jewish state, with an Arab national minority, this must be respected without reservations or caveats. After the Holocaust and 2,000 years of unbridled anti-Semitism, Israel is well within its rights to resist the right of return.

Since 1949, successive Israeli governments have permitted, on humanitarian grounds, some 70,000 Palestinian refugees to return to Israel. To the Arabs, this influx hardly scratches the surface of the refugees' plight. But if truth be told, the Arab world has not even tried to resolve the problem. Indeed, Arab leaders have deliberately perpetuated it in a bid to elicit sympathy and support for the Palestinians.

Yet, in doing so, they have done the refugees a great disservice. They have tolerated the poverty of squalid refugee camps where inter-generational bitterness and vengeance fester. And they have archly rebuffed suggestions for their resettlement outside the boundaries of Israel.

Two months ago, when Canadian Foreign Minister John Manley innocently suggested that Canada would be willing to resettle thousands of Palestinian refugees as part of an Israeli agreement with the Palestinians, he sparked a wave of indignation and revulsion among Palestinian activists. They fear, and rightly so, that resettlement might fatally dilute their case for the right of return.

One final point.

Citing the 1948 Deir Yassin incident, Palestinian spokespersons claim that Israel forcibly expelled or terrorized the refugees – originally 700,000 in number – into exile. They maintain that the Zionist leadership hewed to a premeditated strategy of expulsion. Israel, therefore, bears moral and legal responsibility for their uprootment.

Yet, as Benny Morris demonstrated in his 1987 opus, The Birth of the Palestinian Refugee Problem, 1947-1949 (Cambridge University Press), their flight was largely the unintended consequence of the 1948 Arab invasion of Israel.

Primarily, the refugees were forced to flee due to the circumstances of war rather than because of Israel's malevolent designs. Expulsions took place in Lod and Ramle, as Yitzhak Rabin acknowledged in the Hebrew-language version of his memoirs. But these were isolated, untypical incidents, and should be contrasted to the pleas of Israeli officials to dissuade Palestinian residents from leaving Haifa.

After the war, Israel razed more than 400 Palestinian villages whose occupants had fled, but agreed to repatriate 100,000 refugees. The Arabs contemptuously turned down the offer, and Israel withdrew it.

Since 1948, the United Nations has passed a slew of resolutions, including Resolution 194, entitling the refugees to return or to be compensated for their displacement and suffering. The 1993 Oslo accords also acknowledged the refugee problem, but left it to final status negotiations, which broke down last year.

In the interests of justice, the refugee imbroglio should be redressed through compensation and resettlement within the context of a peace agreement. But the right of return is inconceivable and unacceptable to virtually every Israeli. Israel will not commit hara-kiri to satisfy unreasonable Palestinian and Arab diktats. It is an existential issue, and Israel cannot budge. If the Palestinians are truly interested in making peace with Israel, they must unequivocably relinquish this outlandish demand. Nothing less will do.

YMCA to question anti-Israel report at int'l meeting

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — A YMCA Canada delegation that will attend a meeting of the executive committee of the World Alliance of YMCAs in Dakar, Senegal, later this month is expected to raise concerns over a recently published report that slammed Israel.

The Canadian representatives want to know why the report was posted on the official World Alliance Web site and why the highly contentious report was undertaken at all, said Sol Kasimer, chief executive officer of YMCA Canada.

"We don't support the report because we don't believe the World Alliance should take positions on political conflicts," Kasimer told The CJN.

Kasimer said YMCA Canada would like the world body to remain neutral in the conflict and preserve for itself a role as "mediator and bridge-builder."

YMCA of the USA may take an even stronger position, based on two letters sent to the World Alliance by Kenneth Gladish, the American group's national executive-director.

"We cannot accept the egregious politicization which you have allowed in this matter," Gladish stated in a letter to Nicholas Nightingale, secretary general of the World Alliance.

"Prejudicial, political and polemic rhetoric is of little assistance to the real work of the YMCA. We cannot allow our fraternal relations and support for YMCAs in the Middle East to be undermined by the World Alliance's behaviour," Gladish wrote. "The current course of World Alliance actions puts at great risk the financial and organizational support of the YMCA of the USA for the work of the World Alliance."

Arnold Collins, a spokesperson for the YMCA of the USA said, "Our position has not changed" since that letter. The U.S. group plans to raise the issue in Dakar, he added.

Last November, a five-person international YMCA team visited Palestinian territories and compiled a report that placed the blame for the current round of Mideast violence squarely on Israel's shoulders. The report's authors did not visit Israel nor talk to Israeli representatives. The report has been criticized for being one-sided and discriminatory.

YMCA Canada has received 70 to 80 calls about the report – equally divided between those who support it and those who oppose it, Kasimer said.

YMCA Canada believes the World Alliance's mandate should be to bring people together. He pointed to the YMCA facility in West Jerusalem, which Kasimer said serves all residents without discrimination and whose clientele is one-third Christian, one-third Muslim and one-third Jewish.

YMCA Canada is also concerned that by hosting the report on its Web site, the World Alliance gave the appearance that it is sanctioned by the organization's constituent members. YMCA Canada and the YMCA of the USA have both disassociated themselves from the report.

Canadian Jewish Congress is pleased with the position taken by YMCA Canada, said Harold Brief, chair of the Congress Israel affairs committee.

"We were very impressed that they issued a statement distancing themselves from the report of the international body," Brief said.

Congress met recently with YMCA Canada officials and "we felt they were very sincere. They not only felt hostility towards the statement," they stated that "it was not even the mandate of the organization to do it… and… the credibility of the organization internationally was affected by it," Brief said.

Representatives of the Simon Wiesenthal Centre also lobbied U.S. and Canadian YMCAs, urging the North American organizations to reject the report.

'Cold peace...better than a hot war'

"A cold peace is a hell of a lot better than a hot war."

At this juncture, Israel should not be under the illusion that it can establish more than a "peace of deterrence," or non-belligerency agreements, with the Arabs, Netanyahu said.

Since the PA and the Arab states are governed by undemocratic regimes, Israel and the Arabs cannot expect to enjoy the kind of warm, peaceful relations that exist among Western nations.

To rippling applause, he said, "We won't sacrifice Israel's security for any piece of paper."

Sharply criticizing the outcome of last week's Arab summit in Amman, Jordan, Netanyahu lambasted the Arabs for not making it clear that they desire real peace and that they accept Israel as a sovereign, independent nation.

He said the summit backed "extreme Palestinian demands" by virtue of its failure to address the issue of Palestinian terrorism.

Calling on the Arabs to "wake up," Netanyahu said that Israel will not disappear from the face of the map.

In what sounded like an election campaign stump speech and a pep talk, he said that Israel is on the "right side of history," while Arafat's "corrupt dictatorship" is on the wrong side.

Compared with its Arab adversaries, Israel's military and economic might is growing.

"Israel can be a very powerful country."

But Israel's greatest strength, he said, is its resilient spirit. "It's the glue that binds us together."

In closing, he urged Jews in the Diaspora "to light a candle of truth" to unmask the lies being told about Israel today.

"If we stand up for what's right, we'll prevail."

Netanyahu's address was co-sponsored by Canadian Jewish Congress, Ontario region.

Netanyahu gets blame for terrorist violence

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Israel's former prime minister, Benjamin Netanyahu, is partially responsible for last week's murder of a Jewish infant in Hebron, a Jewish settler from the West Bank claims.

"We are now reaping the fruits of his criminal errors in Hebron," charged Gary Cooperberg, referring to the death of 10-month-old Shalhevet Pass, the victim of a Palestinian sniper.

Cooperberg, foreign press spokesman for Kach party Knesset member Rabbi Meir Kahane in 1984, levelled the accusation in an emotional speech at the Toronto Zionist Centre last week.

A resident of Kiryat Arba, a settlement near Hebron, he declared that Netanyahu's 1997 decision to withdraw from much of Hebron was an act of madness that enabled the Palestinians to take control of the hills overlooking Hebron's Jewish quarter.

"It's a miracle more tragedies haven't occurred in Hebron," said Cooperberg, director of public relations for Nir College of Judaic Studies in Kiryat Arba.

Netanyahu, he added, should apologize for having given up Hebron.

A school teacher in New York City from 1968 until his immigration to Israel in 1979, Cooperberg also laid some of the blame for last week's killing on the shoulders of Natan Sharansky, the minister of construction and housing in Prime Minister Ariel Sharon's current national unity government.

Sharansky, he noted, supported Israel's pullout from 80 percent of Hebron.

Urging Israel to retake neighbourhoods in Hebron now ruled by the Palestinian Authority, Cooperberg lambasted Netanyahu for having pressed ahead with the Oslo peace process, which he contemptuously called a sham and a lie.

"He could have stopped Oslo in its tracks."

Further blasting Netanyahu, Cooperberg attacked him for having backed Israel's 1994 peace treaty with Jordan.

Jordan, he said, is on "stolen land," and rightfully belongs to the Jewish homeland.

Still an American citizen, Cooperberg urged Jews in the Diaspora to make aliyah.

"My main objective is to remind my fellow Jews to come home," he said.

Cooperberg established Project Shofar in 1996 to encourage aliyah. "The Land of Israel is our only home. Exile is a curse."

Aliyah, he observed, confirms a Jew's faith and trust in God.

"As bad as it is in Israel today, we have to be there," said Cooperberg, explaining that he formed Project Shofar after meeting Christian Zionists animated by biblical prophesy. "The nation of Israel is watched over by God himself."

Turning again in his rambling speech to political issues, Cooperberg claimed that Israel's policies are formulated on the basis of pleasing its ally, the United States.

He said that Jonathan Jay Pollard, the convicted American Jewish spy, did not commit a crime because he passed on data to Israel that should have been supplied byWashington.

Indignantly, Cooperberg cited a litany of "misnomers" about the Middle East that have crept into the language.

- The Palestinians as a people do not and have never existed.
- The West Bank should properly be known as Judea and Samaria.
- The word "settler" to describe Jews living in the West Bank is misleading because it fails to acknowledge the historic connection of Jews to the Land of Israel.

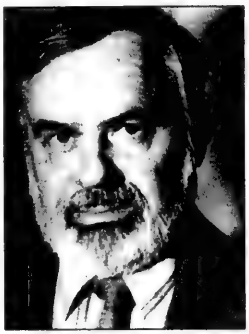
Canada vulnerable to terrorism, professor says

By HEATHER CHEIFETZ
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — Canada is the most vulnerable country in the world to terrorism next to the United States, according to Prof. Yonah Alexander.

It's not just the vast American-Canadian borders and the easily accessible Maritime coastline that make Canada attractive to terrorists, he said. The country is also being used as a base to collect funding, purchase arms and mount operations in the United States and overseas.



Yonah Alexander... terrorism addressed

The ongoing Ahmed Ressam trial in Los Angeles, in which Ressam is accused of using Canada as a base to plot terrorist operations in the United States, showcases this vulnerability, he said. Ressam was caught trying to cross over into the United States in December 1999 with a forged Canadian passport and explosives in the trunk of his car.

Ressam is also thought to be a disciple of Osama bin-Laden, as well as a graduate of one of bin-Laden's secret terrorist training camps in Afghanistan.

Alexander, director of the International Centre for Terrorism Studies at the Potomac Institute in Virginia, was in town to give a lecture called Terrorism in the 21st Century: Facing the Growing Threat.

The event, which was co-sponsored by Canadian Friends of Tel Aviv University, B'nai Brith Canada and Beth Emeth Bais Yehuda Synagogue, was attended by close to 150 people. The lecture was in memory of Ralph Snow, one of the community's leading volunteers, philanthropists and a past-president of B'nai Brith Canada.

Alexander, considered a pioneer in the field of terrorism, is the author of more than 70 books and the editor of several academic journals. He has recently co-authored a book called Osama bin-Laden's al Kaida: Profile of a Terrorist Network, which will be out this month.

Alexander talked about terrorism's impact on his own life, both as a fighter in pre-state Israel's Haganah, and as a teacher who had two former students on board Pan Am flight 103, which went down over Lockerbie, Scotland on Dec. 21, 1988.

Alexander said that part of the problem of dealing with terrorism is that there is no universal definition of the word.

The 1968 hijacking of an El Al plane en route to Tel Aviv from Rome by the PFLP (Popular Front for the Liberation of Palestine) is widely regarded as the instigator of modern international terrorism, he said. No one was killed in the attack, in which 48 passengers and crew were held hostage, but the hijackers had made their point.

Ralph Snow... lecture in his memory

In 1970, there were 300 international terrorist incidents, according to Alexander. Three decades later, that number has risen to 5,500. Terrorism has also escalated in the Middle East in the past thirty years.

Alexander considers chemical and biological weapons as well as the rise in religious extremism and "cyber-terrorism" as the main threats of modern-day terrorist acts. In fact, he said, the Internet, which provides ready access to needed funds, is being used more now for terrorist operations than for propoganda purposes. He pointed out the increased communication between terrorist cells and the recent story of a Palestinian woman who used the Internet to lure an Israeli teenager to his death.

"You don't need a gun anymore, need a mouse."

The proliferation of news-hungry media has also added fuel to the fire, giving terrorist groups a platform to publicize their respective causes, he said.

After his lecture, Alexander took questions from the audience.

"When will the violence in Israel end? How can we get it to stop?" one person asked.

"Give Sharon a chance – that's my best advice," Alexander held up his hands, as if to quell the concerned participants. "There must be reciprocity. You cannot negotiate with a gun pointed in your face."

One of former prime minister Ehud Barak's greatest mistakes, Alexander insisted, was that he was willing to negotiate while Jews were being killed.

The West cannot eliminate terrorism but only deal with it more effectively, he concluded. To do that, we need co-operation between the civilian population, the military and the government.

"But," he said, "the bottom-line reality is that the worst is yet to come."

The freedom to choose

By RACHAEL TURKIENICZ

When preparing to sit at our seder tables, once again our thoughts return to our ancestors in Egypt.

Moses is commissioned to return to Egypt and bring the Israelites out of that land. Time and again Moses is told by God to convince Pharaoh to let the Israelites leave and time and again Pharaoh refuses.

We are all familiar with the story and with the now famous refrain – Let my people go. However, one can search the entire Torah and never find that phrase.

The accurate translation of what Pharaoh is told is not "Let my people go" but "Send my people out." Although the literal translation does not flow as well, its meaning is far more significant.

For Pharaoh to let Israel go, it would mean that Israel is straining to leave and Pharaoh is restraining them. According to this phrase, all Pharaoh would have to do is become passive and Israel would then leave Egypt.

However, the actual phrase in the Torah is exactly the opposite. By saying that Pharaoh must send Israel out, the Torah is creating the image that Pharaoh must actively expel Israel and force them out of the land. This is a very different picture than the one to which we are accustomed.

The major difference lies not in what Pharaoh must do but in the mindset of the Israelite slaves. To create a slave one must destroy their will to be the masters of their own destinies – one must create the slave mentality. Allowing the slaves to physically remove themselves from the place of their enslavement may not result in a stampede toward freedom.

In fact, history has shown that slaves who are freed often remain in close proximity to the area of their captivity. Changing the place does not necessarily change the mindset and the Jewish people were enslaved in body and soul.

God is demanding that Pharaoh send the Jewish people out of Egypt but how will this affect any change in their mentality?

It is important to remember that the goal of the mission was twofold. Moses repeatedly tells Pharaoh that the Jews must be sent out in order to worship God. Not only must the Israelites leave Egypt but they must follow a path that leads them to the worship of God. This path must begin with the expulsion from Egypt.

If Pharaoh merely lets them go, perhaps not all the Jews would leave. Pharaoh's final act as master is to force the Jews out and their final act as slaves is to leave.

In essence, the Jews are forced into freedom because it is only as free individuals that they can choose to worship God. The Jews must understand that their freedom has been granted to them independent of their choice to worship God. Whether or not they make it to Sinai will not affect whether or not Pharaoh sends them out. Only then can each Jewish person truly choose to worship God, the first choice made as a free person.

The Talmud states this point clearly when it says: "God can be served only by free moral agents and not by slaves." Having a relationship with God is not the result of choosing between God and slavery but is the first real choice of a truly free individual.

Slavery as our foundational memory

By RABBI DAVID HARTMAN

The Haggadah is an educational tool aimed at stimulating discussion about the Pesach story. Rather than intimidate or imprison us, it should serve as a catalyst for thought and discussion.

The following reflections are related to some of Pesach's central themes.

The story of Pesach is not told in the synagogue but within the intimate context of one's family, expressing the idea that national solidarity is rarely based on a leap of identification with the collective, but rather grows and is nurtured within the matrix of family life.

The family is the structural foundation of healthy national and communal identities. Nations are as strong as their constitutive family units. The family and Pesach are, therefore, essentially related. Parents, children, siblings, grandparents – the family as a living framework – mediate the foundational collective memory of the Jewish people.

The tendency of young people to define themselves exclusively in terms of the present should be offset by a broader conception of human development. Children have a natural hunger to listen to their parents' stories; exposing them to narratives that differ from their own gives them an understanding of the availability of a variety of human types and lifestyles and thus of the importance of distancing themselves from the unexamined assumptions of their immediate reality.

In addition to infusing the present with richness, memories provide alternative perspectives on life, critical vantage points from which to evaluate the cultural and commercial influences of the present.

Although often taken for granted, the fact that the Jewish people was born as a nation out of slavery and oppression deserves serious reflection. The discrimination and enslavement of the Israelites is portrayed as a radical change of fortune resulting from an Egyptian tyrant's xenophobic fear that they would "join our enemies in fighting against us" (Ex. 1: 10).

What is the significance of this sudden transition from political and economic security and confidence to isolation and victimization? How are we to explain the abrupt contrast between a Pharaoh's grateful magnanimity to Joseph's family for his immense contribution to Egyptian society and economy, and a Pharaoh's paranoid obsession with humiliating, dehumanization and ultimately destroying this despised minority?

For the king of Egypt "who did not know Joseph" (Exodus 1:8), the Jewish people's crime was their being "too numerous." The stranger, the minority, the outsider is inherently untrustworthy and must be denied "too much" power and influence.

The juxtaposition of security, confidence and prosperity (Gen. 47: 5 + 6) with the exploitation and oppression of the same people is a telling statement about the precarious contingencies of human history.

Is this narrative a metaphor of the Jew as the eternal outsider – always vulnerable, never secure? Is the Jew destined to live at the margins of history, to personify the uncertainty and inevitable disillusionment of human history?

It would be ironic if our return to Israel and our national renaissance in a region where we are viewed with distrust and hatred proved to be a yet another confirmation of this tragic historical scenario.

In the modern State of Israel, Jews are vulnerable because they are viewed as a non-indigenous, foreign implant in the Middle East. Nonetheless, we proclaimed our national liberation here. Similarly, on Pesach we tell the story of our vulnerability, enslavement and brutalization while, at the same time celebrating our liberation, our freedom and our regained dignity as a people.

The Jewish view of history focuses on two dimensions: vulnerability, fear and inconsolable suffering on the one hand, and resilience, confidence and hope for a changed future on the other. The Pesach narrative exposes us to the reality of Pharaoh, to the despotic forces of injustice that mock human decency and trust, while at the same time, it describes the liberating power of a God who is the Lord of history – the source of our belief that injustice and suffering are not permanent conditions of history.

In the twentieth century we, as a people, experienced the irredeemable disillusionment of the Holocaust, as well as the revival of our national dignity through the establishment of a State that, we believed, would finally put an end to the myth of the wandering, homeless Jew.

Pesach counteracts both romantic optimism and bleak cynicism. A people is enslaved and oppressed but eventually leaves Egypt, travels to Sinai and dreams of becoming a holy and just nation. The Pesach story is one of disillusionment and despair and one of historical hope and optimism.

Pesach's for kids on the Net

By MARK MIETKIEWICZ

On Seder night, we are supposed to drink wine until:
a. Uncle Irving's jokes sound new;
b. you can no longer tell the difference between Pharaoh and Moses;
c. you don't miss bread.

That's just one of the jokes found on the World Wide Web [http://www.jr.co.il/humor/passover.htm]. The Internet is full of puzzles, games, songs and colouring books to help kids gear up for the holiday.

My favourite Passover kids' site is Nurit Reshef's From Pesach to Shavuot [http://www.bus.ualberta.ca/yreshef/pesach/pesachframes.html]. (You will need a browser which can handle Java in order to enjoy this site.)

Reshef has created a "four room" virtual playhouse. In the library, for example, you can listen to stories in Hebrew and English, learn about the history of the holiday and click on an on-line seder plate and create some silly holiday stories. When you get to the playroom try out the holiday word search, complete the on-screen jigsaw puzzle. And don't forget to play (and win) Passover tick-tac-toe against the dumbest computer in the world.

Need to keep the kids creative while you're getting ready for the holiday? Here are a couple of sites worth checking out. Kids Domain Passover has craft suggestions (make your own seder plate, placemats and afikomen bag) [http://www.kidsdomain.com/holiday/passover/]. The Disapora Yeshiva has an online colouring book that follows the entire seder in 15 panels [http://www.mznet.org/holidays/holidays.htm]. Just download, print and colour. Torah Tots also has pages illustrating the story of Pesach and the 10 Plagues [http://www.torahtots.com/holidays/pesach/pesach.htm].

Since so much time is spent preparing in the kitchen, why not include your kids? Cookbook author Joan Nathan writes, "When children help you cook for a holiday, they learn the meaning of that holiday." [http://family2.go.com/recipes/family/features/family_1997_04/dony/kidpassover1/kidpassover1.html]. You can find her kid-friendly recipes for chocolate covered matzahs, charoset, apple and carrot kugel muffins and chocolate-chip kisses.

Parents will appreciate the hundreds of recipes at the Jewish-Food Passover Archives [http://www.jewish-food.org/category.htm] and at the Passover Cyber-Kitchen [http://www.cyber-kitchen.com/rfcj/passover.html]. If your child has a food sensitivity or allergy to eggs, wheat or dairy, Rivka Leah Schwartz has advice [http://www.jewish-holiday.com/allergies.html].

Are your kids making their singing debut at this year's seder? They can brush up on their Ma Nishtanah at Passover Tunes for Kids [http://www.613.org/kidpassover.html] and Nurit Reshef's site [http://www.bus.ualberta.ca/yreshef/pesach/audiomusicroom.html]. They can sing along with instrumental versions of those songs at Classic Passover Tunes [http://www.kosher4passover.com/tunes.htm].

If your computer has a quick connection to the Internet, you can see a few examples of how Hollywood does Passover [http://kosher4passover.com/movieclips.htm]. In Rugrats Passover, Angelica is Pharoah, Tommy is Moses and the babies are the Hebrews. Also on the page you'll find several clips from Dreamwork's Prince of Egypt. But for the definitive word, watch Charleton Heston as he splits the Red Sea and later receives the Ten Commandments.

If your kids still need more, have them check out the Department of Jewish Education [http://www.jajzed.org.il/pesgnen.html]. Billy Bear's Pesach Holiday site has mazes (Help Moses find the Ten Commandments; Help the people cross the Red Sea) [http://www.billybear4kids.com/holidays/pesach/pesach.htm] and Passover in Cyberspace has dozens' more links [http://www.designsbydaybreak.com/holidays/passover/index.html]

Another game encourages you to search for any chametz which may be hiding on your computer screen [http://www.anshe.org/chometz.htm] With a few deft clicks of the mouse, you are chametz-free. If only cleaning the real stuff were that easy!

The art of asking questions

By RABBI WAYNE ALLEN

As grandfather and grandson meandered through the park one spring day, the child turned to his elder and asked: "Zayde, why is the sky blue?"

The grandfather considered the question and responded with a shrug. "I don't know," he said.

They walked a little further and the child asked: "Zayde, why is grass green?"

The grandfather responded with another shrug, "I don't know."

Some time passed and the little boy asked, "Zayde, how do things grow?"

Completely stupefied, the grandfather could only shrug and respond with "I don't know."

By this time the grandfather could see the look of frustration on his grandson's face. So he felt compelled to add: "Keep asking questions my boy. How else are you going to learn!"

The grandfather in this story may have had none of the answers, but he understood the value and importance of asking questions. This same point is made by the Haggadah we read at the seder table.

The questions that are traditionally chanted by children go unanswered. This puzzling phenomenon has led some of our rabbis to conclude that Ma Nishtanah is not a series of questions at all but an exclamation of the uniqueness of the Passover meal.

For if the four parts of Ma Nishtanah were indeed questions, we should expect to see some answers.

The fact that no direct answers are provided does not mean that there are no questions. In fact, Prof. Neil Postman would argue that the answers are, in effect, irrelevant. In his latest book of social commentary Building A Bridge to the Eighteenth Century, Postman argues that "the most significant intellectual skill available to human beings is not taught in school." That skill, he asserts, is question-asking.

All the knowledge we have, he goes on to say, is a result of our asking questions. The progress of the sciences results in formulating the right questions and experimenting with possible answers. The percolation of new ideas results from asking questions about old ideas. What educators now call "critical thinking" is nothing other than the asking of pointed questions.

The skill that we do not learn in school is exactly the skill promoted at the Passover seder. It is at the seder that our children are encouraged to ask questions, even questions that go begging for answers. Some may argue that this skill can only lead to skepticism and that Judaism is effectively fomenting challenges to the very tradition we seek to inculcate. But this is quite the contrary.

As John Dewey supposed, only a society that is willing to risk asking tough questions is a society that can protect its freedoms. Passover is our Festival of Freedom. And we secure the freedom we have won by asking questions and challenging our tradition. Accordingly, the Mishnah teaches that a person celebrating the seder alone must still ask himself these questions. It is the asking of questions more than the reception of answers that defines us as Jews.

Chag Sameach!

Women's seder puts new spin on traditions

By FRANCES KRAFT
and CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Staff Reporters

TORONTO — Why was this seder different from all other seders? For starters, the women's seder held recently at Beth Tikvah Synagogue was not meant to be a Passover seder.

Instead it was "inspired by and modelled on" the Passover seder, said Rabbi Adina Lewittes, who led the festive event punctuated by singing and dancing, putting a new spin on just about every traditional aspect of the seder.

From the orange on the seder plate (a reference to an infamous comment stating that a woman belongs on the bimah like an orange belongs on a seder plate) and the Miriam's Cup ritual commemorating Miriam's Well of fresh water that followed the Israelites through the desert, to the interpretation of more traditional symbols, the women's seder was intended to educate and inspire.

The specially written Haggadah, for example, provided this interpretation of the bitter herb's symbolism: "Bitter vegetables remind us of the harsh taste of servitude… only those who refuse to be defeated and embittered will realize freedom.

"And so we honour women who refused to submit. Yocheved risked her son's life to save him. And the young slave, Miriam, spoke up to royalty to ensure her people's future…"

An alternative list of plagues includes anorexia, bulimia, obsession with appearance, breast cancer, homophobia, broken families and [the plight of] agunot (women whose husbands won't give them a Jewish divorce).

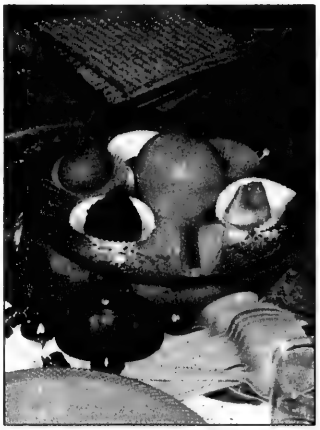
At Toronto Hadassah-WIZO's first "enhanced seder for women" held recently at Beth Emeth Bais Yehuda Synagogue, the list of plagues included poverty, disease, pollution, injustice, intolerance, indifference, hunger, greed, abuse and war.

In a message sent by Sara Chana Radcliffe, a counsellor, author and lecturer, the more than 200 women at Toronto Hadassah WIZO's seder were told to clean their lives of chametz "both materially and spiritually.

"Spiritual chametz is arrogance – a puffed up soul. That is our defence against vulnerability. We puff ourselves up instead of being vulnerable. Pesach is the time to discard that veil; remove every crumb, and throw away the illusions."

We repeat the chorus of Dayenu, it is written in Toronto Hadassah WIZO's Haggadah, "but in today's world, what is enough? If we speak out about our rights to control our bodies and our destinies, will this be enough? If we build homes for the homeless and insist on the dignity of every human being, will this be enough… If we really acknowledge the many blessings in our lives, will this be enough?"

Women's seders are "huge" in the United States, Rabbi Lewittes said in a pre-seder interview from her home in New Jersey.



The seder plate at the Beth Tikvah seder includes an orange to represent women's participation in ritual, a beet — the vegetarian symbol for the paschal sacrifice— and an artichoke, representing the many layers of the Jewish community.
[Frances Kraft photos]

Each major city has "many different" women's seders, she noted, with a seder run by Ma'ayan, the Jewish Women's Project, on the Upper West Side of Manhattan, as the standard, and the main inspiration for the Beth Tikvah version. The New York event, which dates back over 20 years, runs four nights, attracting 500 women each night, said Rabbi Lewittes.

Selma Sage, an educator and lecturer, spoke at Hadassah-WIZO's seder along with Daphna Rabinovitch, associate food director of Canada Living Magazine and co-host of Canadian Living Cooks on the Canadian Food Network, and Rachel Schlesinger, professor of education and an executive member of the centre for Jewish studies at York University.

Sage said that she first attended a women's seder in 1972 in which the table centrepieces contained the four symbols of women's oppression – a typewriter, a lipstick, a girdle and an apron.

In Toronto, the phenomenon dates back to at least 1994, when B'nai Brith Canada's League for Human Rights co-sponsored a "feminist seder" under the umbrella of Women in Interfaith Dialogue.

"It's a learning experience," said Ester Kagan, who attended both the seders. "We can take parts of it and introduce it to our seder," said the mother of two daughters.

Kagan's sister Aviva Spiro, who has two sons, noted that it's also important for boys to hear how important women were to the redemption of the Israelites.

No stranger to seder innovations, Spiro has authored several plays for her children and their cousins to perform at family seders. In fact, the Beth Tikvah event resulted in some informal networking, when Spiro offered to share scripts with an interested participant at her table.

Conservative leaders make time for learning

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — The ninth annual Rose and Isidor Wagner Institute for Leadership Development, or "Jewish boot camp" as it is referred to in a press release from the Conservative movement's Jewish Theological Seminary (JTS), was an intensive six-day program held recently in New York, covering Jewish culture, tradition and practice.

Among the 32 participants were two Canadians, Neil Loomer, ritual director of Edmonton's Beth Shalom Synagogue; and Carson Phillips, a "regular congregant" of Toronto's Narayever Congregation, an unaffiliated, traditional egalitarian synagogue.

But the dearth of Canadian synagogue presidents and board members at the conference doesn't necessarily indicate a lack of interest.

Synagogue vice-presidents or new presidents from Conservative congregations in Vancouver, Calgary, Saskatoon, Edmonton, Winnipeg and Montreal recently attended leadership training programs called Sulam (meaning ladder), run by the United Synagogue of Conservative Judaism (USCJ). The programs include Jewish learning and practical administrative issues such as outreach, programming, volunteers and conflict management.

In Toronto, a January USCJ conference for leadership of large congregations attracted sizeable lay leadership contingents from local congregations, as well as representatives from Montreal and Ottawa.

In the past decade, USCJ has "made bold moves both in terms of educational expectations, academic and personal observance expectations," said New York-based Rabbi Moshe Edelman, director of leadership development for the umbrella organization.

"We want to push the dream up the ladder. You can't be on a rung and stay there. You've got to be moving. Our expectations have tremendously increased, and people are responding to it."

On a smaller scale, Toronto's Beth Tikvah Synagogue has been working on a leadership development program for board members that covers administrative and Judaic issues, both within the congregation and together with United Synagogue's Canadian regional office, said shul president Robert Feldgaier.

USCJ and JTS are two pillars of the Conservative movement, said Marc Wolf, JTS' director of community services, who will be ordained from JTS next month. "We're in two separate institutions, but we're both working for the same cause."

The Wagner Institute is focused on Jewish learning, with a JTS faculty who teach on location at the seminary. Participants are generally referred by their congregational rabbis or by previous participants.

Loomer, 51, who edits the monthly newspaper Edmonton Jewish Life, leads services and conducts most of the life-cycle events for his 315-family synagogue, an egalitarian affiliate of the Conservative movement's United Synagogue, which has not had a rabbi for the past five years.

In the sense that he is not clergy, Loomer is a lay leader, but as an employee of Beth Shalom he falls into a different category than lay leaders who volunteer their time.

The Wagner Institute couldn't have met Loomer's needs better, however, had it been tailor-made for him. "I think it was a terrific opportunity to study with some of the best rabbis and professionals in our movement," Loomer said in a phone interview from his home. "For me this was like fantasy camp – like [base]ball camp – for people who are committed to the Jewish ritual, to Jewish leadership."

The program, which featured services, Shabbat celebration and study with JTS faculty, was "a little taste of everything our rabbis are learning," said Loomer.

Among the issues that surfaced was the halachic basis underlying Conservative Judaism. "We as leaders have to remember this. Unfortunately in many Conservative synagogues we hire a rabbi and expect him to be our token religious Jew. We can't use the word 'religious' to refer only to the Orthodox. We have to show our children that we are observant."

Implications include the number of young people entering the seminary and choosing to become pulpit rabbis, he noted.

Phillips, a Conservative Jew in a non-affiliated synagogue, found out about the institute on the Internet when he was taking an online JTS course. "It sounded fascinating," he said.

"I was incredibly inspired," said Phillips, referring specifically to the faculty which included Rabbi Neil Gillman, professor of Jewish philosophy at JTS; Anne Lapidus Lerner, professor in Jewish literature and Jewish women's studies; Rabbi William Lebeau, vice-chancellor for rabbinic development and immediate past dean of JTS' rabbinical school; and Rabbi Joel Roth, rosh yeshiva of the Conservative yeshiva in Jerusalem.

About Nutrition

By LISA WEINBERG

Q: Are carrots as healthy when they are cooked as when they are raw?
A: Actually, they are more healthy when cooked, puréed or juiced, because those processes allow the body to absorb more of the nutrients in the carrot.
Q: My six-year-old recently had the stomach flu and suffered from significant diarrhea. A friend suggested that I put him on the BRAT diet. What does this mean?
A: The BRAT diet stands for bananas, rice, applesauce and toast. It is bland, and good for binding the bowel to reduce diarrhea; however, you should definitely consult your child's doctor before beginning the diet.

Jewish medical ethics on agenda

TORONTO — A conference on Jewish medical ethics will feature bioethicist Rabbi Moshe Tendler, and Rabbi Eddie Reichman, attending physician at Montefiore Medical Centre in New York and assistant professor at Albert Einstein College of Medicine.

The program, to be held at Beth Jacob v'Anshei Drildz Congregation on April 22 from 9:30 am. to 4 p.m., will be sponsored by the synagogue and the Toronto Area Study Institute of Jewish Medical Ethics.

The morning session will include historical discussions on Jewish medical ethics and the halachic views on human experimentation.

That topic will be discussed by Beni Gesundheit, research fellow in hematology oncology at the Hospital for Sick Children, and a PhD candidate in Jewish medical ethics at the University of Toronto.

Rabbi Tendler, professor of biology and of Talmud at Yeshiva University, and chair of the Medical Ethics Task Force, UJA Federation of Greater New York, will deliver the keynote address during lunch. His topic will be Jewish and Secular Bioethics in 2000: challenges for the future.

In the afternoon, sessions will deal with dimensions of truth during end of life care, organ donation and transplantation and euthanasia.

Warren Goldstein, a neurologist at York Central and Sunnybrook hospitals, and a member of the physicians advisory board of the International Institute of Jewish Medical Ethics, will present a case study entitled A Time to Live and a Time to Die.

Rabbi Jay Kelman, associate rabbi of Beth Jacob, said that the event is "not just for doctors. It is for anyone who has an interest in the subject. We want to raise an awareness of the issues."

For more information, or to reserve, call the synagogue, 416-638-5955. There is a charge of $20 for the general public and $10 for students.

The conference is an accredited group learning activity according to the maintenance of certification program of the Royal College of Physicians and Surgeons of Canada.

Government anti-Semitism said accepted in past

By MARLANE PRESS
Pacific Correspondent

VANCOUVER — During the 1930s and '40s, the Social Credit party's propaganda was not only accepted by the government and the general population, but approved of, says author Janine Stingel.

Stingel, the author of a recently published book called Social Discredit: Anti-Semitism, Social Credit and the Jewish Response, spoke at the Vancouver Holocaust Education Centre (VHEC) on March 21, the International Day for the Elimination of Racial Discrimination.

The speaking engagement was held in conjunction with the VHEC's exhibit Too Close To Home: Nazism and Anti-Semitism in Canada.

"Here is a democratically-elected provincial government in Alberta and a national party espousing anti-Semitism with impunity," Stingel said. "And no one is stopping them. What does that say about our nation's tolerance of hatred and human rights? It was not a good time for Canadian Jewry."

In Social Discredit, Stingel examines the party's anti-Semitic propaganda and the Canadian Jewish Congress's reaction to it.

In addition to the literature that it produced called Father of Lies and the Palestine Plot, the party also produced a newspaper called The Party Organ, which a Canadian Jewish Congress (CJC) official read for two years in a row, keeping track of anti-Semitic articles, Stingel said.

"The CJC officer found that the Party Organ ran anti-Semitic articles 40 percent of the time, which means nearly one in every two issues had anti-Semitic articles in it," she said. "They were... accusing Jews of having masterminded the Russian revolution, causing World War II, being behind the United Nations and having fabricated their own destruction.

"It was really something else."

At that time, says Stingel, the CJC at the time was politically and numerically weak. Its ineffective response, according to Stingel, was part of a broader problem in which passivity and a belief in quiet diplomacy undermined many of its efforts to combat intolerance.

But despite its ineffectual voice within Canada, the CJC tried diligently to meet head on with what it called the Social Credit problem – an ironic reversal to what the Social Credit party deemed a "Jewish problem" within Canada.

"You have to consider the context of the times," Stingel said. "Jews are banned from public beaches; they're not invited to certain clubs. But no one is outraged when the Social Credit says what it is saying. No one is on Congress's side.

"It's easy to be critical in hindsight, but I think the CJC did all that it thought it could do. I felt slightly frustrated myself at times, and in one part of the book – I picked up a little Yiddish along the way – I wrote that what Congress needed was chutzpah."

Social Credit examined

Stingel's interest in politics and anti-Semitism dates back to her school days in Red Deer, Alberta during the early 1980s. She was a high school student when Eckville teacher James Keegstra was dismissed in 1982 for describing Jews to his pupils as, among other things, treacherous and subversive child killers and sadistic money lovers.

Stingel remembers officials visiting all rural schools in central Alberta to ensure that other teachers weren't teaching the same hatred and lies that Keegstra promoted in his own classroom.

"It was later, after I graduated from high school, that I realized what he had done by teaching that the Holocaust was a hoax and that there was a Zionist conspiracy to take over the world. And Keegstra was the second vice-president of the national Social Credit party," Stingel said.

"When I went on to college, I learned more. My book is based on my PhD dissertation."

The CJC endorsed the importance of Stingel's study of the history of anti-Semitism in Canadian society, said Nisson Goldman, vice-chair of the CJC, Pacific Region.

"As Canadians and Jews we must continue to be involved in the political and educational efforts to build a better society. Knowing our history is the first step to bettering our future," he said.

One of the most frightening revelations during the research and writing of her book was the connection between racist 1930s and '40s Social Credit party rhetoric and the language currently being used by extremist groups, Stingel said.

"Let's just say that some of the statemenst about a Jewish world plot by Social Credit politicians is very reminiscent of some of the stuff we're seeing in the extreme right-wing movements today," she said.

"Talk about repeating the past."

URGENT PLEA

Dear Friend עמו"ש,

We are taught by חז"ל about the importance of being נושא בעול עם חברו - helping a fellow Jew with his or her burden. Sometimes, however, a particular situation touches us so profoundly that we are compelled to act even more compassionately than we usually do.

Such is the case about which we are writing. You very likely heard recently about a terrible tragedy that occurred in ארץ ישראל, in which a young father of forty, a בן תורה, was killed together with his youngest child - a nine-year-old daughter - in an automobile accident. This occurred as he drove through a perilous stretch of road near ירושלים, in a region where Arabs often throw rocks.

The young widow, רחמנא ליצלן, who is a native of Toronto, daughter of Tibi and Yehosheva Guttman, is now left with three sons and with little recourse for securing fundamental פרנסה. An emergency fund is being set up in this city to assist the family in their times of need ahead. The fund will remain here and will בע"ה generate a monthly income.

We are asking that you respond warmly to our call for assistance.

Cheques can be made payable to: MEOROT, c/o Mr. Ephraim Reichmann, 98 Prue Ave., Toronto, Ont. M6B 1R5. Please include your return address. All donors of $18 or more will receive a charitable tax receipt.

And may the רבונו של עולם grant that we all be spared further pain and suffering. ומזכה לביאת גואל צדק בב"א.

Through Your Parent's Eyes

Something has happened – perhaps a call that went unanswered – that has led you to a realization. Your parent's housing needs have changed.

"Supporting your parent's decision to move to a retirement residence is extremely important," states Gwen Mackay-Smith, Marketing Manager for Forest Hill Place, a Lifestyle Retirement Community. "Family members offer emotional support and guidance throughout the decision-making process."

HOW YOU CAN BE SUPPORTIVE

- Engage in open, honest discussions – Talk to your parent about your concern for their health and well being. Then listen to what your parent has to say – even if it conflicts with your idea of what is best.
- Become informed – Seniors' housing options are varied so it's important to know the various housing options and care levels available within your province.
- Be understanding – Be considerate of the range of emotions your parent may be feeling and understanding of his/her concerns during this time of decision.
- Do the groundwork – Help your parent determine what they "must have" and "would like to have" in a retirement residence. Then, obtain literature from local residences. After reviewing the information arrange for a tour.
- Let your parent take the lead – Your parent should be as actively involved in the decision making process as possible. This will go a long way towards your parent adjusting to a wonderful, new lifestyle.
- Help to arrange the move – For most seniors, a move to a retirement residence means downsizing. If your parent is uncertain what to take, suggest that they store some of their possessions until they move into their new suite.
- Be supportive during the adjustment period – Remember, home is truly where the heart is. Take an interest in your parent's new accommodations – they are sure to appreciate suggestions about how to make their new suite feel like home.

Lifestyle Retirement Communities operates 17 retirement residences across Canada. For more information on moving to a retirement residence call Gwen Mackay-Smith at Forest Hill Place - (416) 785-1511 or Pam Starr at Glynnwood - (905)881-9475 for a copy of Taking Charge – A Resource Guide to Retirement Residences and Long-Term Care Facilities.

Vancouver's Jewish home for aged overdue for expansion: president

By MARLANE PRESS
Pacific Correspondent

VANCOUVER — Vancouver is long overdue for an expansion to its only Jewish home for the aged, says Lee Simpson, president of Louis Brier Home and Hospital's board of trustees.

Currently home to 217 residents, Louis Brier has a two-year waiting list, and as the community's population of seniors continues to grow, Simpson feels that the development is crucial.

"People are desperate to be admitted to a facility with a Jewish environment," she said. "We need this expansion."

The new $7.5 million facility – to be built on Louis Brier's parking lot – will offer 60 units: 40 private apartments for independent living with available support services and 20 multi-level care suites for people with moderate to heavy nursing needs.

Although most Louis Brier inhabitants are seniors, it is not a requirement. It is, however, a prerequisite that residents be Jewish.

"The positive impact of living in a Jewish environment cannot be overestimated – especially for people in their later years who depend on familiarity," Simpson said.

The advantage of the independent-living units, according to Simpson, is that it will improve the social interaction of future residents, some of whom might currently be living alone and experiencing loneliness.

In addition, it will serve to aid those who are possibly facing nutritional difficulties and safety concerns.

A major fund-raising campaign was launched February 21 and ends March 31. Construction begins in June, and if all goes according to plans, should be completed by June 2002.

"We're well on our way to the $7.5 million," Simpson said. "We're about halfway there, thanks to a most generous donation by Dr. Irving Snider, who gave us $2.2 million."

The new facility – to be called the Dr. Irving and Phyllis Snider Residence – will be independent of government and will be fully controlled by the board of trustees, said Ken Levitt, Louis Brier administrator.

"The Ministry of Health says there will be no more capital funds for construction in Vancouver and no more subsidies for the daily operations of facilities like this in Vancouver," he said. "The board has completely done this on its own."

More information regarding costs, rental availability, and subsidies for persons who have a demonstrated need will be available this summer, Simpson said.

Louis Brier, Vancouver's first home for the aged, was founded in 1946 and has been in its present location at Oak Street and 41st Avenue since 1968. It began as a retirement home for poverty-stricken Jewish males and has undergone previous expansions in 1977 and 1992. It is the only home for elderly Jews west of Winnipeg.

A reasonably accurate microcosm

Scene in Ottawa

By G.K. SIMCOE

It all started with the soon-to-be former Minister of State for Multiculturalism Hedy Fry's assertion about cross burnings in British Columbia. Fry, who is certain to lose her portfolio in the June Cabinet shuffle – if not before – raised the spectre of right-wing, Christian intolerance.

Since then, others have entered the fray, on all sides of the issue. Canadian Alliance members, many of whom are devout Christians, are frustrated and hurt that the label of racism always seems to be tagged on them by so-called liberal pluralists who practise their own brand of intolerance and prejudice.

Joining Minister Fry most recently was Sheila Copps, who was forced to apologize for suggesting that some of these Christians are anything but! Finally, it took the Reverend Bill Blaikie, the veteran New Democrat who served as a United Minister before entering politics, to try and tone down the passions.

The Hedy Fry incident has less to do with religion than with accountability for uttering false or misleading statements in the House. That issue will play itself out in due course.

However, it does raise an important question about religion and the role it plays in parliamentary life. People like Senator Jerry Grafstein often reflect their religious and cultural heritage in their speeches and public discussions. Stockwell Day is not the first to suggest that his religious orientation helps shape his views on public policy matters.

The truth is that there are members in each caucus who hold deeply-felt religious views and colleagues who are dismissive of them as a result. If we are to be honest, we would have to acknowledge in some cases, that attitude borders on contempt for all things religious.

Senator Anne Cools raised the pitch of the debate even higher by claiming that there are those in her own caucus who have expressed explicitly racist remarks. This is all pretty disturbing stuff, especially since as a reasonably objective observer, your humble scribe can confirm that such attitudes are hardly uncommon on the Hill.

The two conclusions to be drawn from these revelations are, in some ironic way almost comforting. First, the Parliamentary precinct is not immune from the same challenges that confront society as a whole and therefore serves as a reasonably accurate microcosm of Canadian society – with all of its warts. The second is that the Hill could benefit from some outreach programming on cultural and religious tolerance. Is anyone listening?

HAMILTON — A delicious aroma of chicken in apricot sauce wafts from a church door in downtown Hamilton: It is the best greeting for a hungry person.

This is the Tuesday night Out of the Cold program that runs throughout the winter, and offers dinner, a place to sleep overnight and breakfast to those in need.

In the basement, a group of volunteers from the city's Jewish community have been cooking since 11 a.m., and they have no idea how many guests they will feed this evening.

They are ready for 120, but one cold night in January, 160 people turned up in need of a meal. The visitors are families with children, and single men and women of all ages.

Some are sleeping on the street, and some are the working poor who have chosen low-paid jobs over welfare but are finding they have little money left for food once their rent is paid.

Others suffer from mental illness, and are unable to cope in the group homes set up for them after the big hospital facilities were closed down.

These are the people Sister Carole Anne Guay, a retired nun, wanted to help and the reason she formed the Out of the Cold program four years ago.

Using programs in Toronto as her model, her goal was to offer seven nights a week of meals and overnight accommodation from November to March in her city.

Each night costs around $600, and solely through donations, she had already managed to fund-raise for three sessions. Last year she met members of the Jewish community, and a fourth self-supporting night came into being.

Gloria Silverman read about her work in the paper, and began to volunteer to see what was involved. She wanted to help found another branch.

"I feel it's vitally important for the Jewish community to reach out. We are very diligent about looking after our own in need, but we need to extend beyond the Jewish community, " she said.

Initially, Silverman had wanted to cook kosher meals and use a synagogue location, but the cost would have been prohibitive, and the synagogues were too far from the downtown core where the program was needed.

To Sister Carole Anne's delight, Gloria raised $12,000 by the end of last summer, and had enlisted volunteers.

Madeleine Levy became volunteer co-ordinator of what she calls the most rewarding experience of her life. She tells of one night in particular. They were stacking the chairs to put out beds, when a man came in asking for food. He had not eaten for three weeks and was sick with fever.

"I made him some soup and a cheese sandwich, and asked him if he had somewhere to stay," said Levy.

He became a regular visitor, and one day, looking cleaner and healthier, he came up to her to tell her he had found a part-time job.

THE COMMUNITY IS INVITED

First small Jewish community to offer program

"He told me I had been his lifeline. He said that what our group thinks might be a small thing had made all the difference to his life. The thank yous are heart-wrenching."

While Holy Blossom synagogue in Toronto has been running a larger Out of the Cold for several years, this is a first for this small Jewish community whose numbers hover at about 5,000.

There is a great sense of achievement, and not just because of the money that has been raised. Silverman singles out the family atmosphere as the most fulfilling aspect, and enjoys the fact that her own family members are volunteering, including Sarah, her eight-year-old granddaughter.

"The most important thing was to get families to volunteer together. I've been a Jewish educator all my life, and taught tikkun olam and the idea that we are responsible for one another. I know that a model is so much better than a classroom. What better model than working with your parents?"

Sister Carole Anne was initially hesitant about children helping, but exceptions were made with the added proviso that youngsters are accompanied by an adult when serving food to guests.

Head Cook Miriam Davidson checks on the soup. Money to buy the industrial stove was donated by local steel company Dofasco.

Now she acknowledges it is the family atmosphere that characterizes these Tuesday nights. The other friendly joke on the street and in the kitchen itself is that the food is good on Tuesdays because Jewish women like to cook.

It was an aspect of the program that was made public from the beginning. As Levy recalls, "We announced we were Jewish the first night we opened, because we wanted to build bridges."

The experience has broken down barriers as well. These were the first Jewish people many of the guests had ever met, just as many of the volunteers had never before talked to the poor or homeless.

The program has been an opportunity for Christians and Jews to volunteer together, and it has inspired a Muslim group in the city to run a session.

Back down in the kitchen, Levy calls the volunteers to a break. Before the guests arrive, they make time for a d'var Torah. Then it's back to the busy hum of buttering rolls and preparing – metal, not plastic – cutlery and china plates, which is all part of the philosophy of treating the guests with respect.

It is almost 4 p.m. when chicken vegetable soup – made from fresh chicken – and rolls are served. The food is bought in bulk, and many local merchants donate supplies. The new industrial stove in the kitchen was bought with money donated by one of the big steel firms in the city.

Head cook Miriam Davidson shows off the stove proudly. She is a cordon bleu chef who used to run her own catering business.

"Our guests can eat as much as they want. It's been nice to see how much better some of them are doing. Because we serve such good food, our guests get dressed up – they feel this is their night out. One lady told me 'the food is so good I've gained 12 pounds this winter!'"

"We have a lot of fun," says Miriam, and she waves a hand over to the two men scrubbing pots at the kitchen sink. "Where else can you find a master baker and a world-famous doctor doing dishes?"

Dinner is at 5:30. The guests will enjoy the chicken in apricot sauce served on fluffy mashed potato and peas. There is tossed salad with vinaigrette, cakes and pastries, fresh fruit with juices, coffee and tea.

The menu is different each week but to offer high protein, there is always a beef or chicken entrée, made from scratch to taste better.

Care is taken to find out what the other churches are offering on their nights so that the guests are not served the same food two nights in a row. Those who sleep over receive a cooked breakfast plus a lunch bag with fresh sandwiches and fruit to help them on their way.

Sister Carole Anne agrees that help is needed all through the year. One of the guests once pleaded with her to start an Out of the Heat program throughout the summer. But the effort is enormous: "I wouldn't be able to keep my volunteers", she says.

Meanwhile, she will herself take a turn to be a guest – for the seder at Levy's home.

"Sister Carole Anne is a wonderful human being," says Levy. "We have learned a lot from one another."

On Campus

Students network at conventions

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — These days, students have a wider choice of entry points to Jewish campus life than in years past.

Probably the best example is Jewish Campus Services of Greater Toronto's (JCS) annual arts festival, instituted in 1998 to appeal to students who may not have been connected to the organized Jewish community.

There's also the "KKK," as some people refer with tongue in cheek to Kesher, Koach and Kedma – the campus groups that are aligned denominationally with Reform, Conservative and Orthodox respectively.

Recently, Kesher and Koach held North American conventions attended by a number of Canadian students and their American counterparts.

Conservative, Reform Jews gather

For Jesse Gold, a fourth-year communications and sociology student at York University, the Koach Kallah held in late February at the University of Pennsylvania was a catalyst for his becoming involved in the Conservative students' organization.

But is there a need for a denominational subgroup when Hillel groups serve all Jewish students, regardless of denomination?

"Yes," says Gold, who was one of 24 students from Ontario among the 130 in attendance. "A conditional yes."

An alumnus of B'nai Brith Youth Organization, Gold believes one of the best things about BBYO was that it "wasn't affiliated with any synagogue, and that anyone was welcome to join.

"That said, I also think it's important to have programming that will speak to particular people... certain Reform people wouldn't necessarily be all that comfortable on an Orthodox shabbaton," he said.

Being on the Koach Kallah "makes me want to become more active again... I've been out of the loop in terms of leadership for quite a while."

Now Gold is involved in planning an Ontario Koach kallah for the upcoming academic year, and, more imminently, is planning to host an upcoming Koach Shabbat dinner at his house.

Other Koach activities being held in Toronto this year include Israeli dancing, Shabbat dinners, holiday parties and a joint program with Kesher on Jewish pluralism.

Kedma, the Orthodox group, has relatively fewer activities since the departure from Toronto for New York of Rabbi Maury Kelman, who conceived of the group. Kedma does, however, have a Toronto presence, and a recently created local board in conjunction with JCS.

Shana Kurlandsky, Koach program co-ordinator for JCS, at whose suggestion Gold attended the convention, said that although many of the students had a prior affiliation with the Conservative movement through their parents or United Synagogue Youth, it was "neat [for them] to meet people the same age that shared their values...A lot of students came back with a great energy."

The program included a variety of study options, including a session on Student Perspectives on Conservative Jewish Life on Campus, and several addresses by Rabbi Ehud Bandel, president of the Masorti movement, as Conservative Judaism is known in Israel.

Jen Ezekiel, a second-year science student at the University of Calgary and a board member of her local Hillel, attended the Koach Kallah to experience an international convention and see how students in other cities run Hillel and Koach. There is no Koach presence in Calgary, whose Hillel has about 60 members.

"We're trying to get more people involved," she said. An alumna of the Calgary Jewish Academy (a local day school that runs through Grade 9) and a former USY president, Ezekiel said there are "so many [of her peers] who are lost" to organized Jewish life. She and other involved students have been talking about raising awareness of Hillel, she said.

Jen Laskin, president of the Jewish Students Association at McMaster University, attended the Kesher convention held in March at Pennsylvania's Camp Harlam, even though the Reform organization is not active at her campus in Hamilton, Ont.

A fourth-year chemistry major, Laskin – who grew up at Mississauga's Temple Solel and was active in her Reform youth group as a high school student – likes the multi-denominational mix at the JSA, but said being at the conference "gave people, including myself, a good idea of where we stand in terms of our Jewish identity."

Many of the other three dozen convention participants, she noted, are in Jewish studies and want to pursue careers as rabbis or cantors.

Thirty-five students, including six Canadians, attended the conference, which included workshops, services and discussion groups.

"It was really more of an opportunity for students to meet other students and connect on the basis of Reform Judaism," said Janice Elster, Toronto's Kesher program intern who is in her fourth year of Jewishs studies at the University of Toronto. "It was re-energizing."

Among the programs Kesher runs in Toronto are regular lunch-and-learn events as well as Shabbat dinners.

Israeli shot after PA issues warning to the IDF

By AMOS HAREL
Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — As the Palestinian Authority (PA) issued a warning to Israel Sunday night that it has "crossed a red line" by entering Area A (under Palestinian control) to arrest six Palestinians, an Israeli citizen was shot dead near Nablus. No other details were released for publication at press time.

The six Palestinians, including five members of Force 17, Yasser Arafat's presidential guard, and another Palestinian civilian, were arrested late Saturday night near the village of Sinjil. The IDF and Shin Bet believe they were involved in recent terrorist attacks against Israelis and were planning further attacks.

The arrests were part of the measures approved by the security cabinet against the PA, and an additional success for the Israeli security forces.

Palestinian sources said the six were grabbed a kilometre inside Area A territory, about two kilometres west of the village of Sinjil, which is under Israeli security control. A number of shooting incidents, especially at Israeli cars, have been carried out from Sinjil and the surrounding villages.

Israel blames Force 17 members, especially those operating in the Ramallah area, for a series of ambush killings and other attacks on Israelis during the recent fighting. Eight Israelis have been killed and more than 20 injured in attacks blamed on Force 17.

The six where caught on their way from the village of Jiljiliya to a Palestinian checkpoint, unmanned at the time, on the border with Area A.

It is thought that the six are part of a cell which works with Fatah, and together are responsible for a number of terrorist attacks around Nablus and Ramallah.

The IDF has stopped seeing Area A as a line that cannot be crossed, and may now enter the area for short periods to put an end to shooting incidents. In addition, the army may enter these areas to carry out arrests, such as those on Saturday night, given relevant information. The focus will be on stopping terrorist attacks before they are carried out, and not on acts of revenge.

Security sources said the Palestinians may respond to the arrests by attempting to kidnap Israeli soldiers. The head of the PA's preventive security apparatus in the West Bank, Jibril Rajoub, said Sunday that the arrests were a "clear violation of the Oslo accords. The Israelis have crossed a red line."

Chief of Staff Shaul Mofaz told Israeli media in response to Rajoub's statement that "the Palestinians are the ones who have crossed the red lines," adding that "the IDF will act wherever needed to harm the terrorists."

In addition to increased attempts to kidnap soldiers, Israeli sources say the Palestinians may also respond to the arrests by holding onto Israelis who enter areas under PA control.

Gunbattles between the IDF and Palestinians raged throughout Sunday evening in various flashpoints in the territories, including the Jenin bypass road, Nablus, Rachel's Tomb in Bethlehem, Hebron and settlements south of Har Hebron. No one was reported injured in these incidents.

The IDF responded with heavy gunfire to a gunshot from the Palestinian neighbourhood of Abu Sneina in Hebron at the end of the funeral of 10-month-old Shalhevet Pass. The precise source of the shooting was never located, and it is possible that a gun went off by mistake.

The Yesha Council of Settlements wrote to Mofaz on Monday to decry the reduction in permanent IDF forces stationed in the settlements. Temporary Yesha head Ori Ariel wrote that there had been a 30 to 50 percent reduction in manpower, despite the hazardous situation and demands that something be done as soon as possible.

In the six months since the start of the recent violence, the IDF has prevented a total of 4,135 terrorist attacks. In the last month alone, however, there have been 10 terrorist attacks within the Green Line, compared to a total of nine over the five preceding months.

The IDF figures state that 70 Israelis have been killed since September 2000 – 41 civilians and 29 security service personnel.

Arafat's fingerprints

By AMIR OREN
Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

Comment

Last week, a senior officer in the IDF General Staff, an expert in intelligence and military operations, was asked how Yasser Arafat's behaviour has changed since Ariel Sharon was elected prime minister.

The officer replied that in addition to the information that is common knowledge – the release from prison of Hamas and Islamic Jihad members; the violation of Arafat's promise to publicly call on the Palestinian Authority (PA) security forces, in Arabic, to cease firing at Israelis; the new emphasis on the fact that responsibility for the shooting and the terrorist bombs in the territories belongs to groups identified with the PA leader such as Force 17 and the Tanzim; the cessation of co-operation between Arafat's preventive security apparatus and the Israeli Shin Bet security service – Arafat had gone one step further than in the past.

According to the information at his disposal, the officer said, Arafat had specifically instructed senior members of Hamas and Islamic Jihad to carry out terrorist attacks in Israel.

If this information is correct, there will be less incentive to preserve the PA as a partner for rapprochement and for an agreement.

Arafat did in fact meet with representatives of various organizations in Ramallah on March 25, in the context of The Committee of Islamic National Forces, and there have been conflicting reports about the issues discussed there.

Security experts who are not suspected of sympathy for Arafat feel that the intelligence picture is more complex, even if the conclusion is not. In their opinion, Arafat must be assumed not to have deviated from his time-honoured custom of avoiding leaving fingerprints on the trigger of the Palestinian rifle. That's how it was when he was exiled from the territories, leaving the attacks to his deputies, Abu Jihad and Abu Ayyad. This is how it has been since he arrived in Gaza.

Intelligence sources consider Arafat responsible for the general order regarding violence toward Israel, including those acts carried out by his past and future rivals, Hamas and Islamic Jihad.

UK Jewish community wary of national census

By SHARON SADEH
Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

LONDON — This year's national population census conducted by the Office of National Statistics has created a stir in Britain's Jewish community.

The census, which is conducted every ten years and which will reach some 24 million homes this April 29, is now asking respondents to state their religion and that of all others present in the house.

Standard information requested on the form includes the names and personal details of all household members. It is an offense not to complete it; 342 people were prosecuted and fined for failing to provide proper responses in the last census in 1991.

Though the religion question is optional and will help the government allocate funds for special groups more effectively, the Jewish community objects to the state's being provided with such information.

The community is also worried the census will confirm that its numbers are dwindling and that it will soon disappear. There may be implications for government funding if it emerges that the group is much smaller than once thought. Forty percent of Jews intermarry in Britian, and the negative birth rate is rising.

According to the Board of Deputies, the elected, national representative body of the British Jewish community, the Jewish population is expected to number between 268,200 and 272,500 this year. The population is expected to fall by some 17 percent in 2016, compared to 1996 figures, to between 229,100 and 245,400. In a population of some 59 million, the community will be no more than a negligible minority.

A related concern is that many Jews will not respond to the question, and so the community will be registered as being far smaller than it really is.

Nevill Nagler, the board's director general, calls on all Jews "to respond to the question without hesitation. We have full confidence in the census, and we are certain that this information will not reach unwanted eyes."

Rona Hart of the board's community research unit says that the authorities have promised that the information will be stored in a database that other government ministries cannot access and that it will remain under wraps for 100 years.

Not all journalists blame Israel first

When Ariel Sharon became Israel's new prime minister, there was fear that the Canadian media would treat him in a negative, prejudgmental fashion. Fortunately, the evidence thus far, with a few exceptions, has not sustained this concern.

To a significant degree, the understanding shown for Israel's predicament with the Palestinians in the National Post and other Southam papers has ameliorated the way Israel is now viewed.

Moreover, there have been other strong, independent voices, such as the Globe's Marcus Gee, who argues that the campaign of Palestinian violence not only violates Arafat's written commitments to renounce violence in favour of negotiations, but also significantly sets back the Palestinians' own aim of achieving statehood.

Gee also believes that Israel cannot be expected to undertake a unilateral withdrawal from the remainder of the territories since "to do so in the absence of a negotiated agreement on peace terms and borders would be to invite chaos and indefinite conflict."

But Arafat has already set about to create a form of chaos – chaos mixed with what William Thorsell, the Globe's former editor-in-chief, described as Arafat's "pathological" drive to portray his people only as helpless victims.

This growing perception of Arafat's true intentions has not gone unnoticed by other journalists as well. For instance, on March 27, following the sniper murder of a 10-month-old Israeli baby in Hebron, the two terrorist bombings which killed and maimed Israelis in Jerusalem, and against the backdrop of the Arab League summit taking place at the same time, CBC-TV's Neil Macdonald said, "Palestinian militants are clearly bent on provoking a bloody retaliation by Israel during the Arab summit… Arafat looks increasingly cornered. He made wild claims… about Israeli soldiers using what he called poison uranium against his people. Arab leaders, meanwhile, are not fulfilling pledges of financial support, citing the corruption of Arafat's regime."

In another report that same day, Macdonald noted the "restraint" Sharon displayed in the face of mounting violence against Israeli citizens, even saying at one point that "Sharon appears to have no taste for sharply escalating this conflict."

The following day, when, after yet another suicide bombing Israel finally struck with prior warning at PLO assets in Gaza and Ramallah, Macdonald observed that Israel's retaliatory action "was probably too restrained to assuage the popular anger that's been building all week."

There will always be journalists who blame Israel first. But let us not lose sight of the many who don't.

Mass Jewish grave found in Poland

By YAIR SHELEG
Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — Forensic researchers have found the mass grave where Poles murdered 1,600 Jews of the northeastern village of Jedwabne in July 1941, a Polish government official said recently.

The government researchers found the site after examining aerial photographs from the early 1950s and the use of sonar equipment, which made it unnecessary to dig in the area itself or damage the remains of the victims.

The barn where the Jedwabne Jews were burned to death was also found.

Andrzej Przewoznik, who heads an agency supervising wartime cemeteries and monuments, said the site can now be dedicated as a cemetery with a fitting memorial.

In July, on the 60th anniversary of the massacre, the Polish government plans an official memorial ceremony and will apologize for the pogrom.

The slaughter of the Jews of Jedwabne was for years blamed on Nazi German troops who occupied the area during World War II. The issue caused a storm in Poland last year, after Professor Jan Tomasz Gross, a Polish-born researcher living in the United States, published Neighbors, a book containing eyewitness accounts of how the massacre was the work of Poles.

The book touched a sensitive national nerve because it questioned Poland's self-image as victims of the brutal Nazi occupation, not collaborators with it.

After the book's publication, a memorial plaque saying the Germans massacred the Jews was removed. A sign bearing the names of the victims will replace it, but the authorities have yet to agree to what extent it will "admit" Polish responsibility for the pogrom.

Everyone searches for breadcrumbs

By GEORGE ERDOSH
Special to The CJN

As Passover approaches, exciting preparations go on in Jewish households. Your mother unpacks and cleans a set of china, dishes and silverware reserved just for this holiday, she cleans the house as if royalty was coming, and the family unearths and gets rid of every single breadcrumb in the house.

Everyone searches for breadcrumbs, looking into pockets, on car seats and under beds, and destroys or gives away every bit. They even get rid of the vacuum cleaner bag into which the bread crumbs are sucked up. Boxes of matzah and matzah meal appear in the kitchen.

When I was a kid more than 50 years ago, I watched my mother go through the same exciting Passover preparation, and my grandparents, when they were kids, watched identical preparations some 100 years ago. This is how Jews passed their traditions down from generation to generation not for hundreds but for thousands of years. Whether they lived in Poland, Russia, England or South Africa, Jews followed all their traditions in exactly the same way, to preserve their own identity among the many religions surrounding them.

Usually, it is the Jewish mother who prepares both the special Passover meal and the seder plate. But the seder plate is easy for you to prepare, and this is a good way to learn this ancient tradition.

Remember, there is a seder on two nights, and you should prepare enough for two seder plates.

Parsley and salt water: Prepare twice as many sprigs of fresh parsley as the number of people at the seder. Place half of them on the seder plate and put the rest in a plastic bag for the second day.

Dissolve one teaspoon of salt in one cup of water in a small bowl. Place it near the seder plate.

Roasted egg: Wrap egg tightly in aluminum foil. Put it in the oven, and let it bake for about an hour. Take it out, let it cool off, and put it on the seder plate. You can either make two at the same time, one for each seder, or use the same one both nights.

Shank bone: Take a lamb, beef or chicken neck, or a shank bone if you can find one, and wrap it well in aluminum foil. Put it in the oven and roast for about two hours. Take it out, very carefully, unwrap it and put it on the seder plate. You will only need one neck, as you can use it for both seders.

Bitter herbs (maror): Most people use horseradish. Fresh horseradish root is best. Take the root and wash it well. Scrape it with a small sharp knife to get rid of the dark outer skin and wash again. Now you are ready to grate the root on a hand grater. You will probably shed tears, because horseradish lets off an eye-irritating gas when it is grated.

If you can grate outside with a breeze blowing or near an open window or blowing fan, you will suffer less. Watch your fingers – it is easy to scrape some skin into the horseradish.

If your mother lets you, you can also use a food processor.

Karpas (root vegetable): People can use something green, like celery, or a potato. If your family uses a potato, boil two whole potatoes in salted water that barely covers them for 30 minutes, or until they are soft but not mushy. Drain the water, and let the potato cool. Peel the potato, slice it into sticks or slices and put it on the seder plate. Put the second one away in a plastic bag in the refrigerator for the second seder.

If you are having large seders, you might want to make two potatoes for each one.

If you are using celery, take off the leaves, and wash the celery stalks very well. Cut off the white bottom, and slice the rest into sticks.

Charoset: This is the best part to eat, but it can take the longest to prepare.

You will need one tart apple, lemon juice, 1 cup chopped walnuts, 1 tbsp. wine or grape juice, 1 tsp. cinnamon, 2 tsp. sugar.

Wash the apple, and take out the core and stem with a small sharp knife or an apple corer. Chop it into small cubes. Squeeze a little lemon juice over the apples and mix well (this prevents them from turning brown).

Mix the walnuts with the wine or grape juice, sprinkle cinnamon and sugar on top and mix very well.

You can also use the food processor for the charoset. After you cut the apples into small cubes, add the apples and everything else in the food processor, and process until the mixture is smooth but not too mushy.

This recipe makes enough for both seders, unless there are a lot of people. You can make more if you want to.

FROGS

Are you ready to leave Egypt? Here is the second of the ten plagues (Exodus 7:26 - 8:11), retold with additions from the Midrash.

Moshe and Aharon (Moses and Aaron) entered Pharaoh's palace, calmly passing by the fierce lions and other wild beasts chained to the walls. They walked down the long, carpeted hall until they reached Pharaoh's golden throne.

Moshe spoke, and Aharon relayed his words to Pharaoh: "Let my people go."

"No," laughed the Egyptian king, flanked by his royal ministers. "The slaves are a vital part of our economy. Why should I release them?"

"If you do not, God will punish Egypt."

"With what? You believe in Him? You are simply good magicians. Just because you can turn water red doesn't mean I should let you and your people free!"

Moshe was surprised by Pharaoh's refusal. The previous plague of blood had been disastrous, and Pharaoh was dismissing it as unimportant!

"Very well then," said Moshe, rising to his full height. "Know that tomorrow Egypt will be overrun with frogs. They will attack you and your nation. They will — "

"Liars!" shouted Pharaoh. "Get out of here!"

"You have been warned." Moshe turned and left.

Early the next morning Moshe and Aharon went to the Nile river. Aharon stretched his staff over it and a tremendously large frog emerged. It croaked thunderously and defiantly, and lumbered toward the royal palace. The Egyptians stared at the huge amphibian in shock. One of the palace guards whipped out his club and belted the frog as hard as he could. The frog opened its mouth, and little frogs shot out. They jumped around chaotically, aiming for the palace, biting unfortunate Egyptians along the way.

Undeterred, the guard gave the behemoth frog another whack, and more frogs materialized from its mouth. Swarms of frogs poured forth, filling Egypt. The colossal frog raised its head and whistled. Myriads of frogs ascended from the Nile, accompanied by crocodiles and other reptiles.

Egypt was full of jumping frogs. They were everywhere. In every glass of water tadpoles swam. Frogs jumped into the bread dough and were baked inside the loaves. People shouted as they tried to communicate over the din, but in vain; the endless croaking drowned out all other sound. Sleep became impossible. People nearly became deaf.

The frogs attacked and bit the Egyptians. When someone opened his mouth to try to eat, frogs jumped down his throat. The entire land of Egypt was a writhing, green mass of frogs.

Pharaoh sat on his throne, batting away frogs, and heard two frogs inside his stomach talking as they tried to escape, biting and scratching.

"When do we get outta here?"

"When ben Amram (Moshe) tells us to."

"Enough!" screamed Pharaoh. "Call Moshe! Call Aharon! I'll let the Jews go! I promise!"

Moshe and Aharon entered the palace, untouched by the multitudes of frogs that attacked everyone else.

"I mean it!" cried Pharaoh hysterically. "Daven (pray) to God. Stop them! Please! I really will let you go! You have to believe me!"

"When should the plague end?" inquired Moshe casually.

Pharaoh desperately wanted the plague to end immediately, but he also wanted to see if God could end the plague at any given time. So in spite of his suffering he replied, "Tomorrow morning!"

Moshe nodded his head, "So it shall be," and returned to Goshen, the Jewish province and the only area in all of Egypt untouched by the plague.

Sure enough, the next morning every frog abruptly died. Egypt was full of dead, decaying frogs. People swept them up and piled them into gigantic heaps. They rotted in the blazing sun, and Egypt stank.

But as soon as the plague ended, Pharaoh began to have doubts.

"God didn't do this," he proclaimed. "My wizards can make frogs too. Moshe is just a super magician. There is no God. I am God! I will never let the Jews go free! They will be my slaves forever!"

Moshe and Aharon heard that Pharaoh had recanted. And they knew that more plagues, worse ones, were coming. Very soon.

Cantors arrange for Sing-in Hallel at Holy Blossom

By CYNTHIA GASNER
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — Sing-in Hallel will present, for the first time ever, a full-length concert covering the entire traditional text of the Hallel.

The program, which will feature classical, chassidic, romantic and contemporary music will take place on Wednesday, April 11, at 8 p.m. at Holy Blossom Temple.

Nine choirs will present familiar selections from their own repertoires and six cantors performing solos, duets and trios, will chant from various renditions of Hallel.

Song sheets will be distributed to the audience, and the Holy Blossom Temple Simcha Band will lead the congregation in songs of Hallel as the audience is invited to join in the singing.

The idea for the sing-along came to Cantor Efraim Sapir of Beth Tikvah Synagogue when he recalled attending a summer sing-along some years ago in Milwaukee, Wis., where he was then serving as chazzan.

"The entire hall was divided into voice categories – sopranos, tenors, alto and bass. We were given the score and the conductor announced the pieces. The audience and professionals joined together in song. It was a fun thing to do."

Sapir says when he spoke to Cantor Benjamin Maissner of Holy Blossom Temple about the "happening in Milwaukee" Maissner agreed that it was a great idea.

Cantor Efraim Sapir (left) and Cantor Benjamin Maissner review the program for the Sing-in Hallel at Holy Blossom Temple.

"It was Beny who came up with the Hallel theme," Sapir says.

It is appropriate to perform the psalms of Hallel (or hallelujah which means praise the Lord), which are an expression of joy for divine redemption, chanted on Passover as well as other yamim tovim and special occasions such as Rosh Chodesh and Israel's Independence Day.

Along with Sapir and Maissner, the program will include Cantor Marshall Loomer of Beth David B'nai

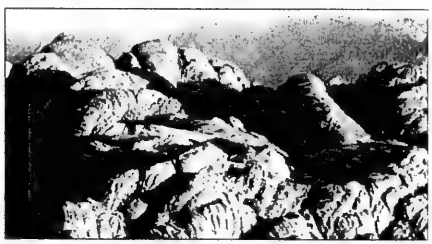
Archeologists try to unearth proof of Moses and the exodus

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter



Mount Sinai is inextricably associated with Moses.

Is the biblical story of Exodus true and based on hard facts? Is there archeological evidence that Moses really existed?

These tantalizing questions are addressed in an intriguing Vision TV documentary – Who Was Moses? – to be broadcast on Tuesday, April 10 at 9 p.m.

The film basically turns on efforts by a corps of international archeologists to unearth evidence to validate the veracity of the Hebrews' flight from Egypt.

Due to the vast expanse in which the exodus supposedly took place, the hunt for ancient ruins and artifacts connected with it has been exceedingly difficult.

We're told that the 1967 Six Day War, during which Israel conquered the Sinai Peninsula, interrupted this archeological quest for about a decade.

Since the late 1970s, however, archeologists from various countries have homed in on the Sinai Peninsula in an effort to come to grips with these conundrums.

In their attempts to confirm what may well have transpired thousands of years ago, they have stumbled upon false leads.

In the Nile Delta, they uncovered the ruins of Tanis, a settlement believed to have been built by the Hebrews during their journey to Israel. Upon closer examination, archeologists concluded that Tanis was not in fact a Hebrew town.

JEWISH FILM FESTIVAL "RETURNS HOME" TO BLOOR CINEMA

The world premiere of a Canadian-made documentary about the Travellers, the famous Canadian folk group of the 1950s, will open Toronto's 9th annual Jewish Film Festival on April 26, says festival director Shlomo Schwartzberg.

"It's a very interesting and uplifting story," said Schwartzberg about the film The Travellers: This Land Is Your Land. "I'm sure it'll get the festival off with a bang."

After two years at the Hyland Cinema in the Yonge-St.Clair area, the popular week-long fesival returns this year to its original venue at the Bloor Cinema, just east of Bathurst St. Because the double-screened Hyland has closed, festival management had been seeking an adequate replacement for what has grown into one of the world's major Jewish film festivals.

"We were hoping the Hyland would reopen, but that didn't happen," Schwartzberg said. "There were other places talked about, but we didn't want to go too far north .... At the end of the day we went back to the Bloor, which is fine because we spent our first six years there."

Schwartzberg said the Bloor Cinema was recently renovated, and its 850 seats should insure a plentiful supply of tickets for all screenings. The Hyland's two theatres had roughly 600 and 400 seats respectively. The drop to a one-screen venue means there will be fewer repeat screenings, he said.

Owing to the uncertainty over the venue, the program booklets that festival-goers traditionally expect in their mailboxes around Passover have been late getting to the printer. Instead, the festival is mass-mailing a flyer describing festival highlights, along with an order form for tickets and passes. The box office opened April 2 (33 Prince Arthur Ave., 2nd floor; 416-324-9121).

Program booklets should be widely available throughout the city about the middle of the month, Schwartzberg said. For details about some of the 50 films being shown, visit the festival's web site at www.tjff.com. Also, see the related story below.

Cinema Verite: A friend, a youthful survivor of the Holocaust, was walking to work one morning last week, and was stunned to see a couple of men wearing Nazi uniforms with swastika armbands beside a parking lot on Richmond Street, near Queen and Victoria. It took a few more seconds for her to notice the long white trailers that indicated the presence of a film crew.

"They were so authentic that it shook me up," she said. "I didn't realize how vulnerable I would feel. It was so bizarre. I've watched so many television programs and movies and I never had a reaction like this."

The pseudo-Nazis, who proved friendly upon approach, were filming an episode of a TV series called Switchblade.

Passages: If you have ever studied music in Canada, chances are one of your first music books was written and compiled by Boris Berlin, the vital and vibrant musical legend who died in Toronto on March 24, two months short of his 94th birthday.

Born in Kharkov, Russia in 1907, Berlin had taught at the Royal Conservatory of Music in Toronto for 72 years – the same length of time he had been married to his wife, Tosia. His books, including The ABC of Playing Piano, Basics of Ear Training and Four Star Sight Reading have graced tens of thousands of pianos across Canada since the 1930s.

Berlin received the Order of Ontario in 1992, and was named Officer of The Order of Canada in February, 2001. He was to have received the award at a ceremony later this year.

'Provocative' film part of Toronto Jewish Film Festival

By BEN ROSE
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — Sleeping with the Enemy is a controversial film about Israelis and Palestinians who are invited to Japan to get away from the "pressure cooker that is the Middle East," according to the program notes.

It will be shown as part of the Toronto Jewish Film Festival (TJFF) running at Bloor Theatre April 26 to May 3.

The 52-minute film made in Israel last year covers visits of mixed groups of Israelis and Palestinians to Japan, where they discuss with their hosts the issues that divide them. It will be screened, along with the 30-minute Hummus for Two, on Sunday, April 29, at 7 p.m.

Sleeping with the Enemy is "complex and provocative," the notes say. The film's director Gil-Har of Israel will be on hand to defend it.

"We are not afraid of controversy," festival director Shlomo Schwartzberg told an audience at Temple Sinai March 25.

Nazi persecution of gays documented

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

To be Jewish and gay in Nazi Germany was to be doubly cursed and condemned.

In setting out to transform Germany, Adolf Hitler launched a concerted campaign not only against Jews, liberals, democrats and trade unionists, but also against homosexuals.

Paragraph 175, a documentary by the American filmmakers Rob Epstein and Jeffrey Friedman (The Celluloid Closet), studiously examines this aspect of Nazi policy.

TVOntario will screen this revealing 73-minute film on April 11 at 10 p.m. and again on April 15 at midnight.

Hitler's aversion to and persecution of homosexuals is a little-known chapter of Germany's 12-year Nazi era.

Although he intitially tolerated politically like-minded gays, he vowed to cleanse the Nazi party of homosexuals after the 1934 Night of Long Knives, during which a number of key Nazis, notably Ernst Roehm, were murdered in a brutal purge.

The crackdown affected ordinary Germans like Gad Beck, whose mother was a Prussian Protestant and whose father was a Viennese Jew.

Beck, all but two of whose Jewish relatives were killed in Auschwitz, tells of the anti-Semitic harassment he suffered in school, but leaves open the question whether he was actually harassed as a gay man.

As well, he describes his attempt, posing as a member of the Hitler Youth, to rescue a Jewish friend/lover from the clutches of the Gestapo.

Beck eventually immigrated to Palestine, but returned to Berlin, his hometown, in 1979.

Paragraph 175 – which alludes to a clause in the 1871 German penal code on sexual relations – dwells briefly and unsatisfactorily on the efforts of Magnus Hershfeld, a German Jew who founded the Institute of Sexual Science, to emancipate gays from the shackles of repressive laws.

Hershfeld failed. In 1933, while he was abroad, the Nazis sacked his institute, and he never returned to Germany.

Although the Nazis' official policy toward gays was re-education, Hitler, in fact, dealt harshly with them. One hundred thousand homosexuals were arrested, almost 50,000 were sent to prison, and 15,000 were packed off to concentration camps, where they were forced to wear a pink triangle.

While the Nazis considered homosexuality as a contagious disease, they adopted a much more lenient attitude to lesbianism, which they regarded as a "curable condition."

The sole lesbian interviewed in Paragraph 175 is Annette Eick, a German Jewish woman who managed to escape to Britain, but whose parents perished during the Holocaust. Unfortunately, she is given scarcely any air time.

Narrated by the British actor Rupert Everett, Paragraph 175 is nevertheless a valuable contribution to Nazi historiography.

Unearthing proof of Moses and the exodus

Yet in the legendary city of Pi Ramesse, where Pharaoh's daughter raised Moses, they found the remains of the chariot stables from which the Egyptians pursued the Hebrews.

According to the Bible, the Hebrews crossed the Red Sea after Moses parted its waters. Archeologists have surmised that a catastrophic natural disaster caused this event.

Indeed, they suggest, the Hebrews crossed a salt marsh, filled with reeds, rather than the Red Sea.

The prevailing theory is that a dormant volcano erupted on the Greek island of Santorini, 500 miles away from Egypt, causing a massive tidal wave that enabled the Hebrews to evade the Egyptians.

The volcanic dust that settled on Egypt, archeologists believe, accounts for at least two of the 10 deadly plagues mentioned in the Bible - the eerie darkness and the lashing rain.

These plagues, they say, prompted the pharaoh to release the Hebrew slaves.

While the flight of the Hebrews from Egypt is explained in fairly credible terms, the film can only scratch the surface of Moses' life.

Most probably, Moses – a founder of monotheism – was but one of many scribes who recorded the 40-year odyssey of the Hebrews to the Promised Land.

Who Was Moses? also deals with another conundrum: where is the actual site of Mount Sinai? An Italian archeologist gives us his take on this issue.

In closing, the filmmakers argue that the story of Moses cannot be dismissed as a figment of the imagination, and that the Bible is a pathway toward understanding history.

Some will dispute this theory, yet the physical evidence gathered about the 10 plagues and the parting of the sea is quite compelling.

Business Profile

Auctioneer sells everything under the sun

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

Newly married couples, wealthy businessmen, politicians, collectors, curiosity seekers and even heads of state make a beeline for Empire Auctions' monthly sales fest.

Whatever their financial status, they share one overarching motivation.

"They come to us because they're looking for bargains," said Michael Rogozinsky, president of Empire Auctions' Toronto branch.

"Everybody likes paying less, regardless of their budget," he added.

With branches in Montreal and Ottawa, Empire Auctions is one of Canada's leading auction houses, and, by Rogozinsky's estimate, the largest in terms of dollar volume.

Founded in Montreal by his parents, Abe and Barbara, the family firm sells everything under the sun at what, he claims, are reasonable prices.

Buyers, however, should be careful. "In some instances," he said, "people go crazy," and overpay.

Purchasers who venture into one of their auctions can expect to find a dazzling treasure trove of articles and bric-a-brac, ranging from antique furniture, jewelry and paintings to rare coins, Persian rugs and sports and rock n'roll memorabilia.

On occasion, Judaica is up for offer, too. Empire Auctions has sold a sterling menorah, as well as a Torah, which was hidden for safekeeping during the Nazi occupation of Europe.

The auctions, held in Empire's spacious showroom in western Toronto, invariably attract several hundred people and upwards of 1,000 in special cases. They may last as long as six or seven hours.

Rogozinsky's customers are from all walks of life.

"We get couples who've just been married and may need a dining room table, and well-established families adding to their collections."

A local press baron, who will remain nameless at Rogozinsky's request, has been known to frequent the auctions.

On one memorable occasion, even the Emir of Kuwait made an appearance.

On average, 1,200 items are up for sale. "Most things sold go for between $200 and $10,000, the bread and butter of our business," he explained.

Yet there have been times when bids have gone sky-high.

A 1911 Canadian silver dollar yielded $450,000. A painting by Emile Borduas was bought for $352,000. Another painting, by A.J. Casson, brought in $154,000.

Rogozinsky has also auctioned off original Group of Seven paintings. "We've sold hundreds of them," he said.

Sometimes, for whatever reason, pieces remain unsold.

Last December, for example, Empire Auctions was unable to sell a Renoir painting, La Famille, listed at between $1.5 million to two million, and a Chagall gouache, La Cirque Jaune, priced from $650,000 to $750,000.

Typically, its pieces are quite impressive. Flip through its catalogues and you will see.

A miniature model of Doug Harvey's James Norris Memorial Trophy. A Chippendale-style carved cherrywood dining suite.

An 18-karat yellow gold Rolex watch. A Soviet tank commander's uniform. A Norman Rockwell print of an old sea captain, a young boy and a dog autographed by the artist.

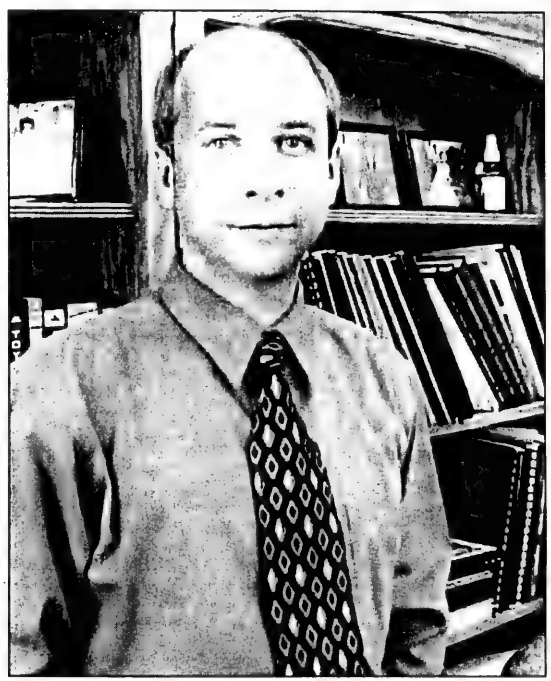
A Norval Morrisseau acrylic on canvas. A hand-woven Caucasian Shirvan rug. A lady's platinum ring with a ruby and 10 diamonds. A grand piano. A silver tea set.

A Louis-Philippe figurative lamp. A Chinese famille rose porcelain ovoid vase. A Kenneth Day lithograph. A mahogany nightstand.

Empire Auctions collects a commission of 10 percent, plus $25 per item, from sellers, and a 10 percent commission, which is part of the sale price, from purchasers.

With trained gemologists and art appraisers on staff, it can guarantee the authenticity of its repertoire of goods. But it cannot vouch for their condition.

Empire Auctions draws on a variety of sources: dealers clearing out inventories, lawyers acting on behalf of clients, people down on their luck, and families upgrading their homes.



Michael Rogozinsky at home in his office.

Rogozinsky also deals with insurance companies and the federal government.

And, of course, there are estate sales.

Abe Rogozinsky, Empire Auction's chief executive officer, works out of Montreal. He began as a rare coins dealer and branched into watches and small antiques in the early 1970s after running a store and operating an art gallery.

Rogozinsky's younger brother, Edward, and his parents look after affairs in Montreal. His sister, Elaine, and her husband, Elliot Melamed, are in charge of the Ottawa office.

Rogozinsky and his wife, Lynn, opened the Toronto branch 10 years ago following successful test auctions.

"Moving away from family and friends was hard, but I love Toronto," he said, sitting in an office filled with family photographs, a vintage Lionel train set, kitschy Beatles figurines and volumes of Empire Auctions catalogues.

Now 40 and the father of three children (Shayna, Adam and Lisa), he has been in the trade for what seems like forever.

"I started before puberty," said Rogozinsky, a graduate of Chomedey Poly Valent High School.

His early jobs ranged from setting up showrooms to helping customers and developing catalogues.

Fixated by the possibilities of the business, he dropped out of Sir George Williams University in his second year, and subsequently qualified as a certified gemologist.

Thanks to his expertise in computers, Empire Auctions was the first auction house in Canada to computerize its operations.

Rogozinsky, who has a yen for rare coins, rare wrist watches, Canadian art, jewelry and Beatles memorabilia, brings an infectious enthusiasm to his field.

"It's the most fun job in the world," he said. "Not only do you see the rarest and most interesting things on a day-to-day basis, but you learn the story behind every item and meet fascinating people.

"This is not a boring job."

Russian Israelis perform Dreyfus File in Toronto

By BEN ROSE
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — The bilingual (Russian and Hebrew) Gesher Theatre Company of Russian Israelis played in Russian to a full house of 700 on March 20.

"It was wonderful," said co-producer, Torontonian Ella Tchelozmova of the play The Dreyfus File, which takes place in 1931 in a small Polish shtetl.

In the play, the town's Jews do not respond to an amateur touring company's attempt to get them interested in the Dreyfus affair. They do not know, as the audience does, that in a few years they will be the Holocaust victims of the same anti-Semitic venom that precipitated the French Jewish officer's trial. (He was later exonerated.)

J.K. Grumberg's play deals with the Jews' idealism, their belief that war is not Jewish business, that a "normal" Jew can be a tailor, a shoemaker or a tradesman, but definitely not a soldier as Dreyfus was.

The amateur play never gets staged, because the young members go away and the old have lost their drive. The final scene is full of irony, as the remaining actors learn from letters that the young thespians who went to Berlin and Warsaw say that Jews are treated politely there.

"We came to Toronto because of its large Russian Jewish population," said co-producer Vicotor Rashkovich.

The cast of seven – Leonid Kavensky, Vladimir Kavensky, Zhenya Dodina, Natasha Voitulevich-Manot, Michael Teplitsky, Pinhas Tavger and Vladimir Portnov – are well-known actors in Israel. They came to the Jewish state 10 years ago, said Rashkovich, a St. Petersburg-born writer who now lives in New York.

The only acting he does is when he reads his own short stories on the stage, he said.

The company's founder, Evgeniy Arye, was not here, but he is credited with having directed the play, which was presented at Earl Haig Collegiate.

The Gesher company (gesher means bridge in Hebrew) has its own theatre in Jaffa, and its members live in various parts of Israel. It has performed Russian and Hebrew translations of Rosencrantz and Guildenstern Are Dead by Tom Stoppard, Tartuffe by Moliere, The Three Sisters by Anton Chekhov and The Idiot by Fyodor Dostoyevsky, in Israel, Europe and United States. The group has won awards for acting, direction and scene design, in Israel and internationally, Rashkovich said.

The actors all learned Hebrew when they came to Israel, and the company performs 75 percent of their work in Hebrew and 25 percent in Russian. It has also put on original plays in Hebrew when no Russian translation is available.

Rashkovich promised that the troupe would return here in a year with dramas in both Hebrew (with subtitles) and English. It will include new actors who know English well, he said.

The Gesher Company came to Israel at about the same time as well known Russian singers like the late Shlomo Carlebach, who was brought to Israel by Rashkovich.

The Toronto visit was part of a schedule that included visits to 10 cities in the United States.

Israel Beth Am Synagogue, who will perform Birkat Hallel and later join Cantor Eric Moses of Beth Sholom Synagogue in the duet Lo Amut. Cantor Anna Trubashnik will chant Adoshem Z'Choronu.

The Toronto Jewish Male choir, Beth Emeth Bais Yehudah choir and Zemer Chorale, Temple Har Zion choir, Holy Blossom Temple choir, Holy Blossom Temple Singers, Temple Kol Ami choir, Lachan, Beth Tikvah choir and Temple Emanu-El choir will be performing.

Some of the selections for the concert will include, Halleluyah, Hodu L'Adoshem, Min Hameitzar, Baruch Haba and B'tzeit Yisrael.

Maissner expressed "profound gratitude to Cantor Sapir for his help and vision" and for his efforts in preparing the program for the first Sing-in Hallel.

Admission is $10. For tickets and information, call 416-789-3291, ext. 224.

CHAT Tigers conclude dream season with championship win

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — CHAT Tigers' dream season came to an exciting conclusion last week with a 6-2 win over Senator O'Connor in the final of the TDCAA separate schools hockey championship.

The victory was CHAT's first-ever hockey title in the mostly Roman Catholic high school league.

The teams were tied 2-2 late in the third period when goals by Oren Eizenman and Mordy Mednick broke the contest wide open. Fans and players erupted with joy at the victory.

"We felt amazing," Eizenman said. "We worked very hard for this. We felt it paid off. No one expected us to win. CHAT had never even made the playoffs before."

The win capped a near perfect season in which CHAT went 23 games without a loss until Senator O'Connor stunned them in game two of the best of three final. CHAT's nearly unblemished record included exhibition, regular season and playoff games, as well as a tournament last November at Lake Placid, N.Y., against U.S. high school competition.

The Lake Placid tournament was a real turning point for the team, said Tigers head coach Adam Chaim. The boys came together in Lake Placid and learned they could defeat just about anyone they played, he said.

Eizenman credited the tournament with creating good team chemistry and camaraderie. "We were so tight, we were actually a team," he said.

Stocked with four AAA players and numerous AA and A players, CHAT cruised through the TDCAA regular season after starting with two ties. In what may have been a portent of things to come, Senator O'Connor tied CHAT in their only regular season meeting in game one.

The championship series proved an interesting matchup between the bigger and more physical team from Senator O'Connor versus CHAT's smaller and quicker players. The Tigers' skill and character accounted for the margin of difference, Chaim said.

The final series was close, said Eizenman, who plays for the Young Nationals' bantam team. CHAT opened the scoring in game one but Senator O'Connor responded with two goals and held the lead until the final five minutes. Eizenman tied the score after working a give and go with linemate Seth Klerer, who also plays on Eizenman's line on the Young Nats.

Eizenman added an empty netter to clinch the victory.

The Tigers were brimming with confidence going into game two, expecting to win the championship and finish the season undefeated. About 150 fans showed up at Chesswood Arena for what all expected was the final game of the season.

The hype may have been the team's undoing. "Everybody expected us to win," Eizenman said. "We came out over-confident, borderline cocky."

Senator O'Connor jumped into a 2-0 lead; CHAT narrowed it to 2-1 but Senator O'Connor regained its two goal lead and held on to win 3-2.

The Tigers couldn't overcome their pre-game attitude. "We weren't giving it second effort the way we usually do," Eizenman said.

The Tigers came into game three with a different mindset. "We just wanted to win," Eizenman said. "It took us a while. We came out slow and they took advantage. They were all over us. Luckily they only scored one goal."

We're Number 1! CHAT Tigers celebrate the win over Senator O'Connor that gave them the TDCAA hockey title.

CHAT Tigers dream season ends with championship

The Tigers couldn't overcome their pre-game attitude. "We weren't giving it second effort the way we usually do," Eizenman said.

The Tigers came into game three with a different mindset. "We just wanted to win," Eizenman said. "It took us a while. We came out slow and they took advantage. They were all over us. Luckily they only scored one goal."

Down 1-0 in the second period, Eizenman and Klerer combined for highlight-reel goal to tie the score. A few minutes later, Rory Gangbar, who plays AAA minor bantam hockey, scored on the power play to put CHAT ahead.

CHAT protected the lead until eight minutes were left in the third period when Senator O'Connor tied the score.

Where other teams might have buckled, the Tigers maintained their composure and scored the go-ahead goal off a faceoff when Mark Klerer, Seth's brother, scored on a rebound.

A moment later, Mednick walked in on a breakaway, deked the goalie and roofed the puck to seal the victory. CHAT added a couple of late insurance goals to win going away.

Chaim attributed the Tigers' late period heroics to the team's discipline and desire.

"It was time for them to dig deep and show the character we developed all year round," he said.

During the season, the team had to overcome more than their share of adversity. They faced a lot of bad calls, hits from behind and "teams trying to get under our skin," Chaim said.

Their biggest challenge – at least in maintaining their cool – was posed by the team from Don Bosco. In an early game against the school, Eizenman was crosschecked from behind and had to leave the game on a stretcher. Luckily his injury proved minor.

CHAT players complained of anti-Semitic taunts in games against Don Bosco and after one game, a Don Bosco player charged into the CHAT dressing room and tried to attack a CHAT skater. Afterwards, Don Bosco players drove around the parking lot waving their sticks from their car windows and challenging CHAT to a fight.

In an other early season game, the Don Bosco goaltender whacked a CHAT skater in the back of the head with a two-handed slash. That was followed by a group of Don Bosco fans swarming the CHAT bench looking for a fight.

Police had to be called to the arena after the game to escort the CHAT players out of the arena.

Concerned over their players' safety, CHAT hired off-duty policemen to provide security at the Tigers' playoff game versus Don Bosco. That series was chippy – as usual – and after CHAT dispatched the goon squad, one of their players threw his helmet and gloves to the ice and challenged CHAT to a brawl.

"We like to play a clean game," Eizenman said. "We're skilled players. Why do we have to fight?"

CHAT's skill and youth should stand the team in good stead. The team's nucleus consists of Grade 10 students who should only get better. Eizenman and Chaim expect the Tigers to be a contender for years to come.

Film part of this year's Jewish Film Festival

He defended showing Sleeping with the Enemy as an attempt to reach out to young people and unaffiliated Jews who attend the festival and Ashkenaz.

A French film, Dad On The Run, a comedy about circumcision, may also ignite controversy.

Films from 12 countries will be included.

The festival has moved back to the 850-seat Bloor from the Hyland on Yonge Street, which has closed, but at the Bloor location, the festival has only one screen instead of two.

Other locations further north were scouted but turned down for various reasons. "We are a heimish festival and we think the Bloor fits nicely," Schwartzberg said.

Another controversial film is Kapo, (May 2, 5:30 p.m.) made in Israel in 1999, which deals with Jews whom the Nazis chose as de facto leaders in the concentration camps.

The directors are Dan Setton and Ben Mayer; the latter may be in attendance.

Schwartzberg said the festival is "going against the grain" in showing these films, as well as one on comedian Lenny Bruce (Swear To Tell The Truth, May 1, 10 p.m.) made in the United States in 1999, and A Trial in Prague, made in the United States last year, (May 1, 3 p.m.), which deals with the show trials of Jews, many of whom had been previously convicted of fabricating charges against other Jews.

The festival is showing Holocaust films which, he said, have become legitimate since Schindler's List. These include The Jazzman From The Gulag, Weintraub's Syncopators: To The Other End of the World, Les Fantômes De Louba, Kippur, Sugihara: Conspiracy of Kindness, All My Loved Ones and Lisa.

Arts & Travel

"Some filmmakers are retracing their parents' footsteps" in the Holocaust films, Schwartzberg said.

The festival will include a tribute to J.B. Salsberg by Aaron Lansky, founder and executive director of the National Yiddish Book Center in Amherst, Mass., with a breakfast at 9 a.m. (Sunday, April 29) and one Yiddish film, Libe and Laydnshaft (Love and Sacrifice), on the same day at noon, followed by a panel discussion at 2:30 p.m. on Jewish humour, including famed comedian David Steinberg.

Guests will include director Robert Cohen and co-producers Shari Cohen and Karen King, who made The Travellers: This Land Is Your Land, which opens the festival at 8 p.m., April 26. Many of the films' directors and producers will be on hand at the screenings.

The criteria for inclusion in the festival include all Israeli films and films made by Jewish filmmakers or having Jewish content, he said.

"One of our problems is that we have to be up front with filmmakers who want their first showing to be at the International Film Festival (IFF) in Toronto in the fall."

The IFF will not show films that get their first screening at the TJFF.

Schwartzberg said the the festival pays $500 for one showing of a film and needs support of the public and the Zukerman Foundation.

About Teens

Dear Karilani,

My history class was recently divided into groups to work on a project. There are three of us in my group and we are all friends. One of the girls, however, is not doing any work. She does not contribute any ideas and rarely shows up when we meet outside of school. I do not want to get her in trouble, but I am tired of doing all her work. It is not fair. Can you help me?

Overworked Student

Dear Overworked,

This is a universal problem. In every group there is always one person who does not pull his or her weight. The important thing is not to let someone get away with it.

Often, people don't work simply because they are unsure of what to do. They are waiting for someone else to take charge and guide them. If you give them a specific task to complete and a date as to when it should be done, they may be more willing to help out. Ensure they understand what needs to be done and help them if necessary. Make sure you are patient.

As well, let them know how you feel. Explain that there is a lot of work to be done, and that you really could use help. Speak in a calm, quiet voice without trying to make the other person feel guilty. You are out to seek their help, not assign blame.

Finally, it may be time to speak with your teacher. No matter how reasonable you are being, sometimes it takes someone older with more experience to help. Remember, by involving the teacher you are not punishing the person but helping him or her. Your friend will get no benefit from not doing work; he or she will only suffer for it in the future.

Dear Karilani is written on a rotating basis by three high school students. The drawing is a composite. We welcome questions from our readers. Please mail, e-mail or fax them to The CJN.

We at The CJN are pleased and delighted to publish our fifth annual Passover Literary Supplement. As always, we received many more worthy submissions than we were able to accommodate in the space available. The shortage of space in this year's supplement was aggravated by my decision to include a selection of essays. Yet we are grateful to all the authors who submitted their work to us, and we hope that the disappointment among those whose work we could not find room to publish this year is not so severe that they will not continue to submit their writing in the years to come. We were the beneficiary of the profound literate and literary creativity among our readers, and we hope that we have meaningfully imparted that creativity. Enjoy the supplement as you celebrate the holiday. Chag sameach.

Hope, Believe and Love
by Simcha Simchovitch

I accept Your reward and decree to be graced with mirth and sorrow, to be great and mighty like a giant and small like a worm trodden into dust into the bowels of mother earth.

I have no choice but to accept the light of the day and the darkness of the pit, the riddle of being, of birth and death,
the splendour of the cosmos, planets and stars.
Yet my heart sinks in sad rumination on the slaughter of life, the murderous deeds – on these my soul laments profoundly.

O light a star that will in the darkness illumine the road and leads to brotherhood, love and mercy that shall heal the sick body of our chosen planet.

Before my heartbeat stops, may I see the dawn of that day.
Let my last words be: Ki-tov.–
Hope, believe and love.

The adventures of McGill Redmen's first rabbi

By ANDREW FAINER

Twenty-five years ago I became the first rabbi to play for the McGill University Redmen Hockey Club. I received my rabbinical ordination from Mike, a Catholic centreman from Small Town, Ontario, who took upon himself the task of giving out nicknames. Just imagine "Shoot rabbi shoot" echoing off the cavernous walls of arenas from Sherbrooke to Chicoutimi.

The "rabbi" tag made sense to the extent that I was taking a religious studies course or two at the time. Yet I was as far from "religious" as a good Jewish boy from Côte St. Luc could be. But I was the first Jew Mike played with and I guess there's no need to cut too fine a distinction with a nickname. Dave, the second Jewish player he met, he called "Dr. Dave" because of his medical school aspirations. The third was Mark, who became "the Eagle." His skating speed gave the impression of a bird swooping down on its prey. He was also seriously balding.

As we rabbis know, there is an ancient Jewish truth that you can learn something from everyone. Another is that it's best to start a story in the beginning. So allow me to say… In the beginning with Mike was the morning after my first Redmen practice. A naturally shy guy, I was minding my own business walking along Pine Avenue on my way to class. Out of the corner of my eye I see a student waving frantically on the other side of the street. I pay no attention because I don't know him.The waver then proceeds to dart in and out of the traffic in a Groucho Marx-like crouch. He comes up to me and says, "Hey, weren't you at hockey practice last night? I'm Mike, how do you like me so far? See you later at the rink!" It was the start of a beautiful friendship and right then was lesson one: if you want to make friends you have to be willing to take a chance in traffic to say hi to someone you don't yet know. Later you'll see that this very lesson is changing the course of Canadian political history.

'Unplanned-for consequences to her hospitality'

Perhaps you might have actually seen Mike at the time. If you were in a crowded elevator, and when the door opened you heard an urgent plea from the back, "Excuse me, excuse me, I'm a doctor" and then saw a scruffy looking young man walk quickly through the parted sea of people, that was him. He was but an undergraduate science student whose sense of humour often outweighed his own medical school ambitions. It could have been irreverence. Had he been Jewish maybe we'd have called it chutzpah, since he frequently did it at the medical sciences building.

Mike shared an apartment in N.D.G with another working-class youth, "the Pic" (short for "Pickle" which rhymed with his last name Nichol). This meant a few important things. First was that both Mike and I were beneficiaries of Dave's after-practice car rides to the city's west end. Second, since Mike didn't cook and didn't have money to eat out, he simply didn't eat all that much. Third, my Yiddishe Momma took note of this, and figuring it might be why he got knocked off his feet during our games too often to her liking, so she made sure Mike ended up at our house for supper every Friday night. With second helpings of everything, he did in fact become stronger on his skates. But there were unplanned-for consequences to her hospitality.

Perhaps because there wasn't that much else to do when growing up in Small Town, Mike had developed a real talent for storytelling. He soon captivated audiences of university students with the story of "You would never believe how well the rabbi eats on Friday night and how nice his mom is." This was the one story he told which did not require any subtle exaggerations. Whether she was expecting guests or not, Mom always cooked "for an army," as she herself liked to say. This was good because pretty soon on any given Friday night during the hockey season, upon Mike's invitation, Dr. Dave's tin-box Toyota carried a half dozen players to our Shabbat table deep in the heart of Côte St. Luc. No doubt had we been a better team, gefilte fish and chopped liver would now be intercollegiate training table staples. More importantly, between Mike's invitations and Mom's cooking, I made lots of new friends. That was lesson two: my friends are your friends and your friends are my friends.

Speaking of which, Dave was a long-time friend of mine who joined the club only after I had told him what great guys there were on the team. Soon after he became Dr. Dave, he provided Mike with an important lesson that was precipitated by their common love of popular music. One evening Mike came into the car and related scrimping and saving for weeks, standing in line for hours, and then being rewarded with the very last available ticket for a Springsteen concert at the Forum. It was in the nosebleed section. Two days later, Dr. Dave held up two tickets, third row from the stage. He gave one to Mike and told him how in the big city you just got to know who to call. For the next two years Mike called Dr. Dave, and always said how lucky he was to be sitting in the Jewish section of the Forum.

You knew how much he appreciated it when he would tell the story, with a now politically incorrect pantomime, of how growing up in Small Town he and a couple of his buddies used to pull their toques half-way down their faces and line up with the kids from the Small Town Centre for the Mentally Retarded at the back of the arena on Sunday afternoons, in order to get into the junior hockey games for free. Of course, a bit later when he played for the junior team and got to share in the gate receipts, he would go to the back of the rink before the game and pull suspicious looking kids out of the line.

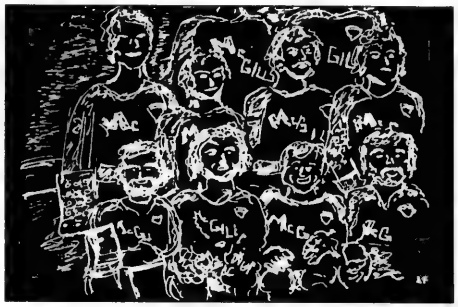
One summer Mike invited me out to Small Town for a few days. He welcomed me at the bus station, accompanied by his pals Gimp, who limped, and Oak, who was as big as a tree. There was going to be a parade in town. We were going to be in it, riding on the back of Gimp's tractor. After a few beers in Gimp's garage we loaded ourselves onto the back of the John Deere for the parade down Main Street. Mike gave me instructions. "Hold your beer in one hand and wave with the other." There was baton twirling, a marching band and streets lined with friendly people. We waved and they waved – even a city boy could catch on.

As we approached the reviewing stand Mike pulled me off the tractor saying,"Get ready to meet the mayor." I didn't even have time to put down my beer. "Mr. Mayor, I'd like to introduce you to the rabbi from Montreal." The mayor shook my hand and told me it was an honour to meet a religious leader, and a pleasure to meet one who did not put on airs. Before I had a chance to respond to his welcome Mike pulled me away. How we managed to jump back onto the tractor I'm not quite sure. As a matter of fact, I'm not quite sure about subsequent events though I do vaguely recall a midnight ride on a bumpy country road on the back of Gimp's motorcycle. Fortunately Mike seemed to remember all the details and some time later when back in Montreal he told them to the boys at the Henri Richard tavern. I don't remember actually giving the mayor the beer I was holding, nor do I remember him giving me the mayoral chain of arms to wear in the parade and for the rest of the weekend. Then again, I was not as used to drinking beer, or telling stories as Mike.



Storytelling aside, Mike really had a way of making stories happen. For instance there was that one time when he was planning a big Saturday night party and he asked me to accompany him on a shopping expedition. So, Saturday afternoon we walked into Steinbergs at the Cavendish Mall. He went looking for crackers and I went a few aisles further looking for chips. I heard him call out loudly,"Hey Rabbi, come over here." The other shoppers froze. He called out louder,"Hey Rabbi, where are you?' An old man in my aisle dropped a jar of pickles. No Jew wants to be seen shopping on Shabbat by a rabbi. It was only when Mike found me and it became apparent the religious title was being used in reference to my baby-face blue-jean wearing self, that the shoppers started to breathe again. By the time I got to the cash I began to hear snide comments about the Reform rabbinate. The Catholic rabbinate would have been more accurate.

There were lessons learned at the party later that night; that it's unwise for fast-skating, smooth-talking hockey players to get into a fight with football players on dry land, and that medicare isn't a bad thing at all. But enough said about that.

The last time Mike came to our house for Friday night supper was just before graduation. After setting the chicken on the table Mom excused herself for a few minutes.

Mike jumped up from the table, and stuck his nose out the kitchen door to make sure Mom had indeed occupied herself elsewhere. He turned to me and said "Rabbi, forgive me, you don't know how long I've been waiting to do this." He grabbed a chunk of challah, raced to the fridge in his Groucho-strut and removed the butter dish. I was a bit alarmed at the kashrut implications until he added, "Which knife can I use?" Mike's Jewish education was pretty accomplished. Mine, not yet.

After not hearing from him for a few years he called me long distance. At the time I was involved in an inter-ethnic romance, which I felt was a truly "cool" thing to be involved in. I must have told Mike about its inter-ethnic character a few too many times because with an uncharacteristically serious note he said, "Hey Rabbi, that's no basis for a relationship. Besides it must be killing your Mother." That romance soon came to an end.

The last I heard from Mike was too long ago. Not accepted into medical school, he was working with developmentally delayed children in another small Ontario town. I did speak recently to Dr. Dave, who really did become Dr. Dave. Though his medical practice is thriving, his greatest joy seems to be driving his son to the hockey rink. I'm pleased to say Mom still prepares extra on Friday nights. You just have to show up at her door and tell her you've read one of my stories, or that you're a friend of Mike's.

Now, as for crossing the street to make friends and Canadian politics, do you remember the mayor? I just read about him in one of the local newspapers. As a candidate in the last federal election he was called upon to clarify his party's stance on Israel. He stated, "Party policy is clear. Canada is a friend to Israel. I, personally, have for many years been a close personal friend to the chief rabbi of Montreal..."

The Myth of the Shtetl

by Marion Gold

Did all the Jews in the Shtetl whose name was Czenczny, in the Province of Kielce, in the country called Poland
Believe in G-d?

Czenczny, a dirt road's length from the Metropolis of Kielce
A day's ride in the horse-drawn wagon
Driven by Baba Shprintzeh, the Shokler.
The Baba Shprintzeh, my great-grandmother, and Der Kleiner Zalman,
My great-grandfather, believed in G-d.
They died of starvation in the Ghetto of Kielce in the winter of 1941.

I'll tell you a story about Shprintzeh the Shokler.
She always had chickens and one nasty-tempered rooster
For eggs, and for Shabbos dining
After the chicken grew old.
The chickens lived in her front yard
Enclosed by a rickety old fence.

Every Monday a happening occurred
In the village market place
A farmers' market magically appeared
Peasants from the surrounding farms exchanged their fresh produce
For the goods made by the town Jews
And cursed them for their wealth

At the end of the afternoon, the men drifted into the saloon
The women and kids trudged home with bundles perched on their heads
Leaving the detritus of their produce
On the floor of the village square.
Shprintzeh opened the gate in the middle of that rickety fence
And the chicks following the mother hen marched after her
In a straight line
Marched to the centre of the village
To dine on the grain that spilled from overflowing sacks.
After eating to satiation, the mother hen led her chicks
Back to the safety of Shprintzeh's garden.

And not one chick ever went astray on that long journey from
The garden to the village square and back again.
A long walk to and from.

Contrast this with the story that the old woman told me
About the twins
Orphans, poor, always hungry
Two boys
Nameless
Living alone
One went into the woods – searching for firewood
Killed by a passing peasant who cursed the Jew for his wealth
Stipped the pockets from the rag that was called a coat
Looking for the gold – the groshen, the kopek – that all Jews
Have buried in their souls
Found nothing
The body was found days later
They, the family, the authorities,
Did nothing
A poor Jewish orphan boy has less value than one of Shprintzeh's chickens.

The surviving twin – he served a purpose
The smoke streaming from the furnaces of Treblinka
Proclaimed to one and all
That burning Jewish bodies create smoke
With patterns such as you have never seen before
And never will again.

The other twin's soul rising to freedom
From cold, from starvation, from hatred, from indifference
Through the chimney of Treblinka
Rising to the heavens
Screaming for justice
And still no one cared.

Passover Suite

by Ray Shankman
for Deena, Raanan and Rya

Why Is This Night Different?

Why is this night different now that we are older and our children are with us each one of us crosses the same desert helping the stragglers lifting the forlorn and lost helping life into life helplessness into healing hope we are here together hearing each story as if it were our own committed to keeping the story alive the journey going

Dancing Into Freedom

Why is this night different from all other nights?
Tonight we found Israel in each other and I danced with Deena first daughter of Israel giggling at our miracle dancing leaps joyous before the Lord

The wine was sweet
our eyes drank to eternity every sip warmed our love gave us life.
Even Elijah stayed for a dram saying, "Your fare is simple, mere matzot and cheese but that's the way it used to be when we truly wondered in our freedom."

Seder Renewal

Brothers and Sisters let us order ourselves around this table to negotiate new covenants;
let's rewrite our tragedies;
let's renew history;
let's translate our enslavement into the freedom of this moment.
Together we endured suffering; now let's share a certain future:
past afflictions can be transformed into renewed blessings;
let us break bread and sing praises to life;
let our Hallelujahs resonate deeply as a tikkun nefesh.

Heal my soul. O Lord heal others so I can be healed.
Let us sing on each cup of wine that zest for life that brings us home to this table, to the singing of this story,
our arms about one another
Dancing into freedom.

Kindertransport From Nuremberg to London, May 16, 1939

by Hanna Tennenhaus

Told to go on the train,
I obeyed.
Terrified, crushed and dismayed, yet
I smiled and obeyed.

Tracks, engines, steel
Swallowed me up
Swastikas waved their Bloody good-byes.
Beloved parental figures turned,
Ghostly unreal.

I cried so long
Till my heart felt like stone
Two days later, in London,
From another train,
A stranger emerged,
Forever a child and alone.

Untitled

by Pearl Saban

Possessing an inner strength, a newly discovered vitality,
crushed spirits slowly fluttered to life.

From a T.S. Eliot waste land he rose, high above the ashes.

Transported to a new land,
a different vista,
he saw a future for himself.

Shaking out the tattered quilt that was his life,
he sat, painstakingly re-stitching its seams, its fabric.
On occasion, the thimble slipped from his finger, the needle piercing his skin, the droplets of blood marring his efforts.

But he continued to sew…
and sow… and reap rewards.

My Yiddische phoenix.

A Clothesline in Jerusalem

by Pearl Saban

Fluttering in the breeze
the stiff little white shirts salute a greeting.
A challah cover,
embroidered with its age-old blessings, waves to passersby.
Shabbat will soon be here,
it seems to cry.
Fringed undergarments swing to and fro, to and fro,
like those deep in prayer.

And on a chair nearby sits a shtreimel, tall, proud,
a warrior warming itself in the sun.

Never Again

by Sarah Fogg, 11 years old

The blue vase holds its dark, stark history of lives in ash
While Treblinka cries with forgotten voices of murdered men
The loud clatter and clang of black boots, knocks on doors,
Seventy are savagely squeezed into boxcar number ten,
Inside the ghetto walls we privately pray, Amen
It's all up to me to promise, never again!

"Juden, Raus!" order the gruff Gestapo,
Poland was flooded with death camps then,
Children's laughter and games are stained and strained,
Childhood is kidnapped, aflame and lost to evil men.
Arbeit macht frei was their lie and war cry back then.
Suitcases stacked high like barbed-wire fences, "never again!"

The Big Lie

By DEBBIE SPRING

On the first day of Hebrew school, Jackie Jackowski and her friends wait for the bell to ring.

"How was your summer, Jackie Jackowski?" asks Melissa, cracking her gum.

"I had six boyfriends at camp," she brags.

"How many, Jackie Jackowski?" asks Fran the jock.

She struts. "A boyfriend every week."

"You were only gone one month. How could you have six boyfriends in four weeks?" asks Nadine, the math genius.

"So four. I had four boyfriends." Jackie plays with her ring, on her forefinger.

"Four boyfriends?" repeats Melissa.

"Well, three." Jackie scratches an itch on her arm, on her leg, then her head. "One doesn't count, because he had to go home early with the chicken pox."

"Three?" asks Suzanne, who throws a rock, playing hopscotch and hops one, two three.

"Two," says Jackie crossing her fingers. "One said he liked me, but never made a move."

Cassie made the moves on the first guy and stole him away

"Two, Jackie Jackowski?" asks Lindy, one of the twins.

"Only one." Jackie stands on one foot like a flamingo. "Cassie made the moves on the first guy and stole him away."

"Did you have any boyfriends at camp, Jackie Jackowski?" asks Mindy, the other twin.

"No, I didn't have any boyfriends. The boys at camp were creeps. Pimply, ugly slimeballs."

"Didn't you go to an all girls' camp, Jackie Jackowski?" asks Melissa, blowing a bubble the size of her face.

"Maybe I did, but I made lots of friends."

"How many friends, Jackie Jackowski?" asks Fran, jogging on the spot.

Jackie shrugs. "Okay, okay. Camp sucked. The girls were stuck up and hung out in cliques."

"That was some lie, Jackie Jackowski. Now that you're back at school, what are you going to do?" asks Melissa, her bubble bursting all over her face.

"Get lots of A's."

"How many A's?" asks Melissa, picking off pieces of gum.

"I'll be lucky if I pass with Mrs. Lipshitz."

Melissa puts her arm around Jackie. "That's more like it, Jackie Jackowski. That's more like it."

The Three Pesach Fish

By RUTH BERNARD

The down comforters were strung out on the clothesline in the garden. Quickly I finished my homework and ran downstairs to ask Mutti if I could help. Permission granted, I fell into step with the maid, on her way to beat the feather beds clean. I too picked up a teppichklopfer, a carpet beater, and with as much strength as my six-year-old frame could muster, I pounded the quilts to remove any chametz that might be lurking in the folds.

Soon the rugs would undergo the same treatment. Coats and jackets would be turned inside out and brushed with vigour. The yearly purging of leavened bread had begun. Pesach was approaching.

It was the spring of 1932 in Stuttgart, Germany. The anti-Semitic rumblings were getting louder and clearer by the day. However, we were still able to get kosher meat and all the Passover foods to which we were accustomed, and we were able to shut out the evil long enough to observe the ritual of our faith.

That would change in the future, with each seder becoming more sparse and the climate more threatening, until three of my siblings and I performed the absolute "Passover" and fled in mid-1939 with the Kindertransport, just ahead of the Nazi army as they marched toward the start of war.

But I was still young and innocent in 1932, and I remember that Passover more clearly than any other – and not only because of the fish.

After a solid week of scrubbing, dusting and polishing, in which I played my part by shining the silver until the light was reflected in it, the day before the seder arrived. Despite the fact that we had a housekeeper, Mother always did her own cooking. She was afraid to entrust our strictly kosher kitchen to anyone else.

That year, I was old enough to help with the knaidlach. As soon as I got home from school, I ran to the bathroom to wash my hands. Even though the bathroom was as large as a bedroom, I was able to see that the room was filled as soon as I crossed the threshold. There seemed to be splashing and movement. I drew closer. My eyes opened wide. I stood watching for a few moments and ran screaming to my mother.

"There are three big fish in the bathroom!"

"Yes, Grandma brought them up because there was trouble with the plumbing downstairs," Mother replied.

My grandparents lived in the apartment below ours, but Mother's answer made absolutely no sense to me. It seemed, however, that this was the only explanation I was to get. How could I have imagined that all three of those fish would grace a seder table once they had undergone a transformation?

Mother walked me back to the bathroom and left me watching the displaced denizens of the sea in fascination. The small space seemed to make them very agitated. Their gills puffed up in rapid succession and the fins waddled from left to right. My mother's call drew me away and I scampered off to break the eggs for the dumplings.

Before I had to go to bed, I went once more to watch and talk to my new friends. Hours later, after all the adults were asleep, I tiptoed along the long carpeted hall for another visit. To my shock I saw that all the water was gone and there were no fish in the tub. After I recovered, I assumed that they had been taken downstairs to Oma's house, where they were supposed to be in the first place.

'I thought about the fish several times'

The next morning, during my pre-yom-tov bath in the freshly scrubbed tub, I asked Mother if she thought that the fish were happy in their new home. She assured me that they were. I thought about them several times during the day.

However, the hope that this Pesach I might be the one to find the afikoman, the piece of matzah that Father would hide at the start of the service, filled me with speculation, and I forgot all about the fish.

The return of the afikoman always warranted a gift of the finder's choice. I could almost feel myself rocking the new doll in the green velvet dress that I had seen in the Schocken store window.

At the seder, I watched Father's every move. I saw him put the matzah wrapped in a white napkin behind the pillow he was leaning against. My sister was distracted because our young brother was jabbing her and she was hitting him back. That left the field wide open for me.

Father began to chant the Ha Lachma Anya. I looked down the table and smiled at the little boy who, Mother had said, was a guest along with his sister, mother, father and grandparents, but I did not know that the chant sung in Papa's sweet voice was a warm invitation to the poor and needy to take part in the festival meal.

As soon as I had asked the four questions, I waited for the right moment to undertake my thievery. Father moved his upper body forward to uncover the dish with the matzah and start the story of the Exodus. I swiftly got up and grabbed my find.

With the afikoman resting on my lap, I dreamed about how I would comb my newest puppe's hair and make her say Mama.

After the meal of eggs, fish, soup, meat and vegetables was eaten and the delicious honey cake and tea that followed were consumed, it came time for the second and last dessert. That, of course, was the piece of matzah in my lap.

The game began. Papa said I would not get anything and I told him I would not give the afikoman back. Since each participant had to have a bite of this piece of unleavened bread without which the seder could not be completed, I knew that I would win.

Just as I was about to say what I wanted, I heard my aunt Rachel say: "The fish was so good and the freshest I ever tasted. You brought them home alive, didn't you?"

With this, I remembered my three friends swimming in the bathtub and began to whine: "I want my three fish, I want my three fish!"

The day after Pesach, I found three goldfish in a deep glass bowl on my dresser, instead of the doll in the green velvet dress.

Shabbat Lights

By APRIL SHOUR LAUFER

Friday was a day of aromas. It was like walking into a dense bouquet of smells that filled the kitchen and spilled over into the hallways. The rich inviting smells wafted out the front door whenever anyone opened it. The kitchen was busy with movement, a to-and-from from the stove, oven, sink, windowsill, table and fridge; there was a feeling of anticipation.

Chicken soup was bubbling on the stove. ("The best in the world," the grandchildren said, "you should sell it" as they slurped and asked for seconds.) And from the oven, the smell of poppy seed cakes. Mixing spoons tossed into the sink. On the windowsill, the pickles fermenting in jars that had been saved from previous occasions. The kitchen table laden with the chocolate and nut cakes that were already cooling. The potatoes were being peeled and grated for her wonderful potato kugel, the taste just right, not too much salt, the texture perfect. And the cucumber salad sitting in plastic containers in the fridge next to the coleslaw, both marinating since the night before. And fruit salad with melons, green grapes.

Just the roast chicken and her meal would be done. Still time to make the forspeis, avocado salad for the Shabbat day, and letcho, a mixture of eggs with tomatoes and mushrooms. Almost ready. Time to shower and change her dress.

The Shabbat table had been set first thing in the morning. The tablecloth, white and starched and shining with the crystal glasses and silver cutlery and gleaming plates. The challah set on a special cutting board inscribed with the words l'kvod Shabbat (in honour of Shabbat). And draped over the bread an embroidered cloth that her nieces had recently presented to her after their trip to Israel.

She can feel her mother's presence next to her

And then it was time.

Everything ready.

Her face warm and shining and freshly scrubbed. On her head a lace scarf. The Shabbat candles sitting in the branched candelabra on the recently polished silver tray. She lit the candles with a long wooden match. Then, with her hands held in front of her, she embraced the light of the candles, once, twice, three times. She covered her eyes with her hands. Her lips moving as she recited the blessing over the candles.

She stood before the candles for several long minutes. Tears streaked her cheeks. The stories of past Shabbats took over her thoughts and tumbled into the words of the blessing. Remembering and longing for her family, her home. She wanted to be that child again, to feel safe, and protected.

She sees herself standing next to her mother. She can feel her mother's presence next to her.

Baruch: Blessed are you dear God for allowing me to stand here to welcome this Shabbat day. Grant us long life and health. My children, my husband, my brother, my sisters-in law.

I remember how my mother stood, how she looked as she lit the Shabbat candles. Managing a house of so many children, running the store with my father. No matter how busy the week, the house was always ready for Shabbat. I would stand beside my mother and my bubbie. The candlesticks set on silver share and her special smile. She never lost her faith. She believed. She knew what strength life sometimes demanded, and she was ready. I miss her so much. When I look at my children I think of her. How her eyes would shine as she looked at her own children, how she looked when she felt satisfied with what she had been able to accomplish. I see her every moment. I can only pretend that I am able to do all the things that she did so well. I can only try.

Adoshem: Blessed are you, dear God to whom I pray, to look after the souls of my dear ones, my parents, my brothers, sisters.

You could not protect them, then. Grant that their souls are in peace, now. Grant them rest. All that this world has to offer still cannot bring them back to me. I cannot hold my mother's hand, I cannot embrace her. I cannot tell her things that have happened to me. I cannot show her the children, my children and her aniklech.

Elokeinu: God who looks after this world, and the world hereafter, the God of my mother and my father. Blessed for ever. I remember once. I did not want to live without my parents. I wanted only to be with them. But it wasn't meant to be. That I would perish in the camps with them. I had to go on. God did not want me yet. A year of hiding. My little ones and me. Not knowing how or if we would survive. And after the war? What was there to do? I had to make peace with myself. I had to go on. I met my new husband and we had a child.

Melech Haolam: You who are supreme, who gathers the souls of the departed and grants them everlasting peace.

As I stand here before the Shabbat lights, I am thinking of my home. I can feel its warmth. Shabbat was a wondrous time, the candles flickering over the dining room table, the linen starched and white, the special Shabbat dishes, the cutlery gleaming. I want to hold onto those special feelings. I don't want to let them go. I know that when I open my eyes I will see the Shabbat candles but I will not be able to turn to my parents. To say Shabbat Shalom. And for this moment… I do not want to let go of the remembering.

Asher Kidshanu: Sanctified is this day. Yet on this day, I mourn the loss of my parents. I want to celebrate the Shabbat with them at MY table. I see my mother as she covers her eyes to light the candles. I feel her presence in the glow of these Shabbat lights. I want to hear my father sing the words of Shalom Aleichem. If only, if only they were here.

Bmitzvotav: I do the mitzvot and I think of those who are not here. As I light these Shabbat lights, somehow it gives me strength to find meaning in this world even though I do not understand how I was able to survive. I never imagined it. How could I go on without my mother? My father. I remember praying that I would be allowed to join them. The memory of the war is like a bad dream. I did not ever imagine that I would have to face the world alone. They were my strength. But I did live and I had no choice but to accept that fact. I was given my life and with me, my newborn son and my nephew.

Vetzevanu: I take joy in my family. My precious children.

Lhadlik: I light these candles as my mother and my bubbie lit the Shabbat candles. It was a Friday night when the transport came. I will not forget them. I will always remember this day.

Ner: The light from these candles sheds its radiance over my Shabbat table. All is ready.

Shel Shabbat: Shabbat of memory.

Shalom for all Israel.

And at the end of the prayer, of remembering and longing, the tears slipped down her cheeks. She took her hands from her eyes, looked at the bright sparkling lights of the Shabbat candles. With the palms of her hand she wiped the tears from her cheeks. She turned and kissed her children, Shabbat Shalom. They did not ask her about her tears.

Shirat Ha-Shalom (Song of Peace)

by Marina Mashaal

Evening arriving is what it is,
Blues, greys, pinks on yellow shadow.
Chagall knew
There was no dark.
Only the colour of light striking.
Shalom takes the present.
He unwraps and holds it
Like a drop of bevelling
In the light, to colour me and him.
He looks at me knowing
My gift cannot do more.
O Shira, love, my peaceful love,
Sings Shalom as he rises
In step with the prisms
Alighting our window.
Like an Expressionist, my husband
Slowly impresses my world to name
The tints it hides within itself.
Name colours, like sky,
Make the light happen.
Still, he sifts the rooster-
Coloured fragments of the day
Gently falling on my face.
Shalom's eyes speak like stars on sand.
The prisms bend weightless
As a bird on a vine
Bare and shimmering
In the grape fields.

The House of Jacob

by Daniel Gold

Like the emperors who had conquered all the world,
And then dreamed of their youth when victory was dear
And the battles not yet won,
So too do I dream of days in the desert
And a pagan land.
Of idols and their orgies,
And our righteous God.
When, at any moment, in anger,
The house of Jacob could be washed into the sea.
When even Eliyahu did not believe.
And of those years before I was born,
When Jews greeted each other on the street.
And talked of the miracles of survival
And war.

Zina the bag lady

By WOLF BRONET

This is the story of Zina the bag lady. She was unlike any other person that I have ever known, not just because she was a bag lady, but because something about her was different.

Zina would spend most of her time outside the St. Lawrence bakery on St. Lawrence Street in Montreal, Quebec, Canada, an old-fashioned type of bakery that bakes rolls and bagels in a charcoal oven. The bakery had been around for many years and is still in operation today.

I am not quite sure how I came to meet Zina; it had to have been sometime around the late '70s, early '80s. I was on my way into the bakery and saw this woman standing in front of the store. Now Zina did not look like your typical bag lady. She did not stand there holding a shopping cart filled with junk. All she had was a leather satchel, which she kept clutched under her left arm. I often wondered what she kept in there.

She had long black greasy hair, which trailed all the way down her back until it reached her waist. It was thick and stiff and looked as if it had not been washed in months. She was dressed in rags with a cord around her waist, as if to keep her pants up. Her face, although dirty and weathered, looked serene, yet her mouth was in a kind of a little smirk, almost as if she had pity on the passersby.

Out of curiosity I asked the bakery's saleslady, Esther, if she knew of this mysterious woman. Esther told me that all she knew was that her name was Zina and that she liked sweet things. Feeling sad for Zina, I tried to give her a dollar on my way out so she could get herself a cup of coffee and maybe something to eat. But to my surprise, she refused to take it and ran away and hid in the back of the bakery. Insistent that she take the dollar, I followed her and tried to stuff the money into one of her pockets. I left as quickly as I could.

When I got home, I told my family what happened. My son Moishe, who was a teenager at the time, was so intrigued that every time he would go by the bakery, he would always buy Zina a piece of cheesecake.

This went on for quite a while; every time I came to the bakery, she would be there. She always looked the same and would always run away, refusing to take my money. But clever man that I am, I always managed to slip into her pocket a dollar or two.

Over the years, as I got to know Zina, I noticed that she never talked, never complained and never asked anyone for anything. It was as if she was locked within herself and nobody could make her say a word. But she seemed to be happy. I wondered how could she really be happy living on the street in front of a bakery, not accepting help from anyone, wondering where her next meal would come from. Whenever I looked at her, she reminded me of my mother in the Warsaw Ghetto during World War II.

One day, very late in the fall, around the Jewish holiday of Sukkot, I picked up a Montreal newspaper. To my surprise, on its front page was a picture of Zina, covered with a blanket of snow, sleeping on a bench near the Rachel Street Market. The article described how Zina's landlord had locked her out and how neither the Jewish community nor Jewish Family Services had taken care of her, on account of the holidays. The only people that did end up taking care of her were the police. Until then, I had not known she was Jewish. The story upset me something awful.

Outraged and upset, I started making inquiries. I found out that she was in the Jewish General Hospital. I immediately went to visit her and brought her some cheese danish and some other sweets. I visited her every day after work for several weeks. The doctors, nurses, and social workers began to wonder who I was. They asked me if I was a relative. I told them that I was just a concerned citizen. They asked me if I could bring some steel combs, brushes and stuff for her hair, as they couldn't wash or brush her hair because it was so thick and dirty.

David Russenek, a friend who happened to be a barber, was nice enough to supply me with the necessary equipment and tools for her hair. The doctors had to struggle with Zina to wash and bathe her.

After a couple of weeks, Ann Applebaum, the social worker that was looking after her, asked me where the best place for her would be. Did I think she should be placed back in her environment or in a home for the elderly?

I told her that I had no idea and that she should use her own judgment. After all, she was the social worker. She decided to put Zina in one of the residences on Decarie Boulevard, and Jewish Social Services would look after her.

Zina's new apartment was really nice – a one-room studio fully equipped with a balcony. She received three meals a day. The building even had a social hall and a big screen television. It was full of nice people.

'No one knew what happened'

I visited Zina at least once a week, sitting by her and talking to her, but she did not speak. Sometimes, my wife Henia would accompany me and she would talk to Zina, but Zina would only listen and never speak.

One year, in the country up north in Ivy Sur Le Lac, we ran into my friend Ruth Sohmer and some other people we had not seen in a while. We began talking and I happened to mention Zina to them. As it turned out, Ruth said she knew Zina from public school and she would bring me a picture of the graduating class with Zina in it.

Ruth brought it, and next the time I went to visit Zina, I showed her the picture. By the expression on her face, I knew she recognized herself. Ruth had told us that Zina had a mother and a sister who lived in New York and that after she came back from New York she changed. But no one ever knew what really happened. It was pretty impressive that Zina remembered the picture, as it was over 60 years old.

It had been many years that I had been visiting with Zina. One day I just broke down and cried, really hoping that she would finally open up to me. Say a word, something, anything, I thought. That day my wish came true. Zina actually spoke, telling me that Ruth's maiden name was Kruger. I was so happy after all these years that Zina finally said something to me. I felt like I was making real progress. And when I called up Ruth and asked her, she confirmed that her maiden name was in fact Kruger. Zina had been right.

Zina had left everything behind and run away

One evening after work, I went on my usual visit, only to discover that Zina had left everything behind and run away. It seems she was still a free spirit at heart. Her place was outdoors.

After a while, the police caught up with her and again placed her in the home. Before long, she was back to her old routine. The staff and social workers wondered how I had managed to get her to speak a few words since she still didn't speak to anyone. But she was very well-liked because she never complained and was very easy to handle.

But after some time, Zina ran away again, leaving the comforts and services of the residence behind. After weeks of looking for her and asking Jewish Family Services where she was, I could get no information. I was hurt and very upset and really worried about Zina. She had become my friend.

I asked my daughter, who knew one of the directors of Jewish Family Services, to help me out. She managed to find out that Zina was locked up in a special facility. I was so relieved. It was wintertime, and just the thought of Zina on the cold streets of Montreal was too much for me to bear.

The next Sunday, I got her some sweets and fruit and went to visit her. At first, the staff gave me a hard time, not letting me see her. The man who ran the home was a Jewish man of Russian descent. I spoke to him in Russian and must have put him at ease because he let me see her. By the expression on her face, I could tell she was glad to see me, but again she did not talk. Even the things I used to bring her, she still would not accept. I always had to leave them in her room.

This went on for a few years. She never gave anybody any trouble or problems. Everyone who heard Zina's story wanted to help. I have a friend at the "Y" who is very Orthodox. He found out that I would visit Zina and take care of her, and one day he offered me $100 for her. I told him that I could not take his money. So he offered me $500. I still said no, and when he offered me $1,000, I still refused. He told me that by taking such good care of Zina, it was like I was buying myself a piece of olam habah, a place in heaven.

I said, "Moish, keep your money and give me your hand." We shook hands and he said, "You are my partner."

"If you feel so strongly about helping Zina, you should go and visit her yourself," I said.

He gladly agreed and we went to visit Zina together. As time went on, Zina got weaker and weaker. Her legs started to swell and she was spending more time in bed. She must have been in her late 70s by then. The home's operator asked me to give him my telephone number just in case.

The next time I went to see her, I had no idea this would be the last time. She had been in bed for days and for the first time that I knew her, she said to me, "Wolf, can I have a Coca Cola?" I ran downstairs to the bagel store and got her the drink.

The next day, I received a call from the operator. Zina had passed away and the agency that was making her funeral arangements wanted to know if I would be able to attend the service. But Zina had had no relatives or friends. She never had anybody. I asked my brother-in-law and his wife Pearl and my wife Henia to come.

At a Jewish service, you have to have at least 10 men in order to say Kaddish for the departed. I attended, but we still did not have enough men. So I called in reinforcements. I went to the funeral home staff for help to get a minyan.

At the service, the rabbi asked me if I could deliver a eulogy for Zina. I was not quite prepared for this but I had an idea: A Jewish writer by the name of I.L. Perez wrote this story at the end of the 19th century, I think about a man by the name of Bontsha Schveig. Bontsha was the name of the man and schveig means silent in Yiddish.

Bontsha was an orphan and kids used to make fun of him and beat him up. But Bontsha never complained. After many years of abuse, he found solace in religion, becoming very pious. Though he was always hungry and abused, he never complained or demanded anything. When he died, there was no minyan for him at the cemetery, nor even his name written out on a piece of cardboard. This was his life in this world. He lived and died without complaining or demanding anything from anyone, much like Zina.

But in the heavenly world, it was different for Bontsha Schveig. When he arrived there, all the angels, from the smallest to the most important came to greet him. He was their hero. "Bontsha Schveig is here!" they screamed. Even God himself dropped in to welcome him. Then the chief angel, after greeting him on behalf of the entire heavenly body, said, "Bontsha Schveig, you can have all the things you missed in the other world before you died. You name it and it is yours."

After thinking awhile, he said, "I would like to have, if it is possible, a roll with butter."

I told you this story to compare Zina to Bontsha Schveig. All Zina ever asked for in life was a Coca Cola, and Bontsha Schveig, a roll with butter. Neither complained or asked anything of anyone. In my eyes, Zina was a saint. If Zina could hear me, she would probably say, what is all this commotion about? That was Zina, as I knew her.

P.S. At the Jewish General Hospital, I was told that the leather satchel contained $1,700. Nobody ever did find out what happened to it.

The Ballad of the Sabbath Lights
by Itzik Manger

The monk stands in the dark cell, his eyes are aflame –
"Young witch, when will you ever acknowledge the silver cross, and Jesus, our Lord?"

Says the maiden: "How can I take the cross in my hand and not disgrace the Sabbath lights, the golden lights of my mother, –
how can I, dark monk?"

"Young witch, kiss the cross and Jesus will redeem you of the affliction that lurks in you, the evil ghost that sings out from your lips!"

Says the girl: "How could I touch the cross with my lips and not lose eternally the golden Sabbath lights, –
how could I, dark monk?"

"Know your life, and your death, precious is every moment.
What do you see, girl, through that pane?"
"I see a hellish fire and bloody shadows on your mantle!"

The monk walks, the maiden walks, her hands tied with ropes.
A hundred fingers lit up at once sharper the bouncing fire – red fire in the dark steppe.

And when the fire burned out, only gray ashes remained,
seven golden Sabbath lights shone in them brightly.

Seven golden Sabbath lights.

Translated from the Yiddish by Simcha Simchovitch to mark 100 years since Manger's birth on May 30.

Camp Hello, Goodbye

By RONALD RUSKIN

We were a poor family. We lived in a hot apartment on top of my father's drugstore. Then my father told me he had saved enough money to send me to Jewish camp.

No more platzing in heat or sitting at Sunnyside Beach with Bubba shrieking about polio if I swallowed lake water. I was going to sleep in a real forest.

"What forest, Bubba?" I asked.

"In the north, Reuben. Nem a winter coat," bubba urged.

"How long will I be gone?

"Drei vochen."

"What do they do in camp?"

"Essen und shloffen. Gornisht mit gornisht."

Like the rich Jews, I was off to overnight camp.

* * * * *

That summer, after Grade 3, we moved to Cedarvale Ravine. Instead of cement, telephone poles; and instead of non-Jews outside our windows, there were flowers, trees and Jews. So many Jews lived on our street that on Shabbos the sky grew misty from chicken soup.

My brother Danny was five, and my mother's stomach was puffed up again. Soon my brother Shlomo would jump out.

Three trumbaniks, Bubba would say.

"Are we really rich, Bubba?" I asked.

"Reuben. Stupid questions, don't ask."

* * * * *

When we lived over my father's drugstore in Etobicoke, there were many non-Jews in the area. They walked straight, had red cheeks and grew over six feet.

My family was short, swarthy and shifty-eyed.

"See," Bubba pointed out. "Goyim grow too big to get sick."

Each night, Bubba and my parents argued over business.

"Listen for once," Dad said. "For me, this area is good."

"Good? Who buys pills?" Bubba yelled. "The goyim never get sick."

"Soon the Jews will move west," said my mother.

"West? Gevalt. Go east. Live with Jews now," Bubba argued.

They screamed. They fought. Goyim bought drugs only when they felt near death, Bubba shrieked. How could father make business with goyim. Jews chupped pills and cod liver oil. Jews felt near death all their life. Did a goy worry? Please.

For a Jew, tzuris were life. A Jew needed a doctor and two pharmacists.

"Bubba, if there are no Jews, how do we make money?" I inquired.

"Alla Talyeners," Bubba said. "Talyeners?"

Bubba explained that Italians were superstitious and nervous like

For a Jew, tzuris were life

Jews. Way back, we were related, she assured me. Talyeners lived in the west end – Catholics mit tzuris and sick with guilt.

They saw their doctors daily.

"Farshteist, Reuben?"

* * * * *

When we moved to Cedarvale, Bubba told me about Jews.

"Cedarvale is what they call a Jewish territory," Bubba explained.

"Is everybody a Jew here?"

"Everybody," Bubba said. "Cedarvale was settled by Jews."

You couldn't blink without seeing Jews. Three blocks to the north were shuls, cheders, Hyman's books, Zigelstein's butcher shop, Louis' bakery and Goldie's foods.

My mother wrote shopping lists. I shlepped empty Eaton's bags, put them into Danny's stroller and together we pushed.

It was a scene from Ben-Hur.

"Reuben, please, I'm tired pushing," Danny said.

"Full speed. Another three blocks north. Try."

Danny sat in the stroller and I loaded groceries on his lap. Sometimes we had accidents. He dropped tomatoes, a milk bottle would break, gehuckde leber or some flunken got lost.

"Where's my flunken?" Bubba said three days before camp.

"Somewhere."

"In the bag, it's not. When did you last look?" she asked.

"Near Glencedar and Eglinton."

"Go. Find it," Bubba said. "No flunken, no camp."

Danny and I checked roads, alleys. For hours, we looked.

Bubba's flunken had grown legs and run away.

* * * * *

My mother worked at the drugstore, puffed up and pregnant. Bubba was suspicious, not a social type, so she warned us not to shpatzier with strangers. She overbaked, overcooked, areinshtupped us with food. We turned zaftik. For exercise, Bubba sent us on errands to Eglinton.

Father was at work. It was no picnic, believe me.

"Don't cry, boychiks. Some day you'll have a friend," Bubba would reassure us.

"We just got you." Danny said. "A bubba is no good."

"Du host a bruder. Nem a shtickel kuchen, mandelbrot."

She gave us food when we got sad. Like pigeons, we noshed.

"I want to escape," Danny whispered. "Can I go to camp?"

"Sure. I'll put you in my trunk."

"You promise?"

* * * * *

Three days before camp, my mother took me to see our doctor, Feter Herschel. The rule before camp was to have a physical. Uncle Harry had been in the war. He wore a moustache and had revolvers, bayonets, bombs and bullets on the walls of his examining room

"So Reuben, what's bothering you?"

To calm myself I stared at his bullets. "I'm fine."

"Fine is no answer," Uncle Harry said. "What hurts?"

"Nothing."

"Nothing is not an answer. Something always hurts."

"My stomach hurts. It's twitching."

"Gevalt!" Uncle Harry examined my stomach. He shook his head. He put me on his scale. He listened to my heart.

"Is it cancer?" I asked.

"Your pupik. Look! They are stuffing you like a gans."

"Bubba does it," I explained.

"Stop noshing. That's an army order."

Uncle Harry's prescription put an end to childhood. Lots of exercise. Cold showers and baths. No kuchen!

* * * * *

Two days before camp, Bubba and Mother went into a frenzy, re-checking labels on my clothes. From work, my father brought bug repellent, iodine, vitamins, aspirin, suppositories, mouthwash, Vaseline and calamine.

Danny watched everything shoved into a trunk.

"Das is alles." Bubba pushed in gatkes and a parka. "Genug."

"Reuben, there's no room for me," Danny chirped sadly.

In a shoe box, Bubba threw six pounds of kuchen and mandelbrot. My trunk puffed up like Mom's belly, ready to explode. My dad cinched it tight with a belt.

We had twin beds together. The night before camp, Danny and I were on shpilkes. We couldn't sleep.

"What's camp like?" Danny asked.

"You sleep in a forest."

"Is the forest far away?"

"North. Snow. Bears, Bubba says."

"Who takes care of you?" Danny asked.

"Bigger kids."

"What's the camp called?"

"Camp Hello, Good-Bye."

"Who says?"

"Bubba."

Jewish camps had Indian words like names for trees or moon phases. But my camp, Bubba called Camp Hello, Good-Bye.

Next morning Mom and Bubba shlepped us to the bus terminal at Bay and Dundas, where there were mischugoyim from Hamilton, St. Catharines, Sudbury, Ottawa. Everybody cried. Bubbas stuffed food in bags so no one would die of starvation on the bus. In the '50s, most of us were fat enough to live six months without food. The Bay bus terminal was like the Exodus. Families shoved, yelled and moaned.

Danny cried to be with me.

"Reuben, don't leave me with Bubba," he begged.

Bubba grabbed Danny by the neck. He fought back.

"Don't worry, Danny. Remember visitors' day."

"When will you write home?" my mother asked.

"When I get off the bus."

"Don't be tzugeshvitzed," Bubba said. "Or chilled. If clothes you need, write. If you're sick, see a doctor. Watch for schwartzfliegen."

"Don't worry," I said. "Bring Danny."

Bubba clenched her false teeth. "If he's good."

* * * * *

Bumpy. Noisy. Camp songs. Filthy jokes. Poker. Did we let loose! The driver yelled "Shveig!"

By Gravenhurst he had gulped three Alka-Seltzers. One smart-alec named Melvin shouted a warning about camp. He planned an escape.

"Don't set foot in Hello, Good-Bye!" he warned.

This was how camp got its name? We drove into a dark forest. Huge bugs flew up from the road.

A dirt playground and huddle of flimsy white cabins waited in a semicircle beside the Israeli flag. A langelosch in a camp shirt waved the bus in.

"Welcome to Camp Hello, Good-Bye," said a huge sign.

We filed to our bunks. Boychiks here; maidelach there. "I'm leaving this dump," Melvin said. "People die here."

* * * * *

What could I do? I learned to climb. I found a top bunk. That night I shvitzed and heard camp stories. There were strange noises outside.

Melvin, the camp kvetch, took the bunk beside me. Nonstop he complained. There was quicksand at camp; the food was awful; campers got typhoid; counsellors were morons; the director was a pervert. Three years straight he had come.

"If you hate it, why come back?" I asked Melvin.

"Nothing I like," Melvin said. "I hate everything."

"Take my bubba's kuchen. Here. You'll feel better."

* * * * *

That night, to make Melvin feel at home, counsellors told Zionist stories of Israel's birth. Every camper must make aliyah, they said. They told of Jewish survival against all odds.

Then they told us homicidal patients had escaped from an asylum downshore from the camp, or herds of Bigfoot lived behind Cabin 14, or German U-boats lay in Muskoka waters ready to blow us up. Nightly, the stories grew worse.

We slept with bats under our blankets. At night, we rehearsed pressure points and death-holds. One sneeze was enough to mobilize the entire camp.

* * * * *

Years later Danny and Shlomo went to camp. All my cousins and relatives went to camp. Like everybody else, they complained about food, the waterfront, the wild animals and the scary stories.

Forty years have passed and my three children have been to Camp Hello, Good-Bye. One visitors' day, in a corner of a bunk, I saw my name etched into a rafter along with Melvin's. He went back for the next two years.

It was the best of times, it was the worst of times. So, vos noch?

Red Hydrant

by Malca Litovitz

Your father was a bully in a wheelchair.
Battered in Poland,
He battered you.
Sometimes, you are student,
Your voice scratching the telephone lines,
But basically, you are a female Odysseus,
Making the long trek home.

I thank God for my kind father,
His blue eyes benign.
The house I lived in had a red fire hydrant and mother's lilacs.
Safe little Penates, household god,
You are a beacon to the lack of emergencies.

Arrest, arrest –

I am Lotte;
my vulnerable nude lies down on your flowered carpet, rises to paint you as a gift –
800 poems wrapped in brown paper – my whole life
given to you –
Death and the Maiden,
the sound of the sea –
that bird still singing sweetly – all of those who told me I couldn't, all of those who went mad before me – sinking into the big couch of oblivion upon which I refused to rest.

Jewish Toronto Tomorrow : One Year Later The Dream Takes Shape

Building partnerships today for our community of tomorrow

Jewish Toronto Tomorrow (JTT) is an innovative vision, powered by UJA FEDERATION and its partners to ensure a flourishing future for Jewish life in the Greater Toronto Area. The JTT initiative, which is creating dynamic new partnerships between philanthropists and community organizations, comprises three key components.

1 The annual UJA FEDERATION campaign to support human and educational services for Jews, here in Toronto and around the world.

2 A capital fundraising campaign to expand and rebuild Jewish community facilities to accommodate continued growth in the years ahead.

3 Development and management of a major endowment fund to create a secure source of community funding for the future.

JTT ensures that our children and grandchildren can grow up in a place that reflects the richness of their Jewish experience, a place where they feel a strong sense of belonging and security, today and tomorrow.

FROM THE CHAIRS

By Leslie Gales and Barry Sherman
Chairs, JTT Steering Committee

Barry Sherman

Leslie Gales

Our tradition inspires us to help one another – areivim ze bezeh. Mutual responsibility and a commitment to social justice are the threads that weave the fabric of Jewish Toronto Tomorrow. With your support and involvement, JTT will facilitate in the creation of countless endowment, capital and annual gifts to support our community. An unprecedented undertaking, to be sure, but one that is essential to the future viability of Jewish learning, culture and human services.

Our phenomenal Jewish population growth is a blessing, but it is also a challenge that bears serious responsibility – our shared responsibility.

If JTT is our community's answer to the question "Will my grandchildren be proud of their Jewish heritage?", then we must work cooperatively to keep the dialogue going. We must invest in the infrastructure, programs and services that are needed to sustain and strengthen the fastest growing Jewish community in North America. We must extend our reach to one another, areivim ze bezeh. ◆

Jewish Toronto Tomorrow is already changing the face of our community. Since its April 2000 launch, JTT has made great strides in undertaking projects that touch every area of Jewish community life.

This year's UJA FEDERATION annual campaign, Campaign 2001 – The Campaign for Our Children – has raised $42 million to date. Our community's endowment fund, The Jewish Foundation of Greater Toronto, is nearing the $100 million mark. Many exciting capital projects are already taking shape under the JTT banner, leading to three separate campuses of Jewish life in downtown Toronto, the Bathurst central corridor and York Region.

JTT has already created some successful new realities for the community of today and tomorrow. Through its partnership efforts, the Community Hebrew Academy of Toronto (CHAT) found the funding it needed to expand the crowded Wilmington campus and build the Anne and Max Tanenbaum Education Centre. "CHAT has been described as 'the educational backbone' of the Toronto Jewish Community. Our two campuses are places where minds are encouraged to grow. Now, in partnership with JTT, we are expanding our physical space to meet the accelerating community demand for CHAT education," says Paul Shaviv, headmaster at CHAT. And it was JTT that spearheaded the establishment of a second CHAT campus, CHAT Richmond Hill, to serve the educational needs of students in the burgeoning Jewish population north of Steeles.

Encouraging community involvement

JTT Steering Committee co-chairs Leslie Gales and Barry Sherman are encouraging as much participation as possible in the JTT effort. "It all starts with doing more Jewish," Sherman says, "more volunteer time, more leadership development and more support for community projects. Jewish Toronto Tomorrow is an opportunity, shared by every member of the community, to preserve and enrich Jewish life from generation to generation."

Gales describes JTT as a dynamic blueprint for action. "Empowering the community and working collaboratively, Jewish Toronto Tomorrow partnerships will deliver far-reaching Jewish community programs and services across the GTA."

Building on the Annual Campaign

The UJA FEDERATION annual campaign continues to be the backbone of support for community institutions in Toronto. Our community's extraordinary growth has challenged the annual campaign's ability to meet all of the community's demands. JTT can fill in the gaps by connecting donors who have specific interests to the "dream" projects of community partners.

Venture Philanthropy

Jewish Toronto Tomorrow exemplifies the new philanthropy, based on collaboration and a commitment to change. JTT has taken on the advisory role of communal venture capital brokers, matching the needs of community agencies with the visions and interests of philanthropists.

"If we want to succeed in looking after our needs as a community, we can't rely on the old way of doing things," says Barry Sherman. "JTT's pioneering vision," according to Gales, looks at the big picture and widens the playing field, bringing more players to the team. It's truly revolutionary in scope and scale and the way in which like-minded individuals can successfully collaborate on community endeavours."

Funds for the future

In the past three years, UJA FEDERATION's endowment fund has quadrupled to nearly $100 million and JTT's concentrated efforts guarantee this growth will accelerate through the years ahead. Channeling the income from these new endowments into tangible projects, the invested capital will remain intact for Jewish Toronto forever. ◆

Joseph's coat symbolizes the historic dreams of the Jewish people

Jewish Toronto Tomorrow Partnered Allan Silber with Zaroinu/Reena/BJCC to create The Kids Club, a program for developmentally challenged kids

Putting the Jewish Toronto Community on the map!

After just one year, the impact of JTT is putting Toronto on the map as an example to the world of what collaboration, commitment and community can achieve. As its strategic plan unfolds and matures, the JTT imprint will be increasingly visible in projects and services, facilities and forums affecting the quality and continuity of Jewish life across the GTA.

THE DREAM DOWNTOWN

It may come as a surprise to learn that some 25, 000 Jews live in the downtown Toronto core, where our community traces its earliest roots. The downtown Jewish population is one of Canada's largest, comparable in size to Ottawa. "People talk about a Jewish urban renewal but, in truth, the community south of St. Clair has always been strong and it's growing day by day," observes Bloor Jewish Community Centre President Mark Sarner. "What is changing, however, is the dramatic focus of attention on this hub of history." Gerald Schwartz is chairing a high profile consortium to coordinate JTT's downtown initiatives.

The Bloor Jewish Community Centre is at the heart of Toronto's JTT-inspired downtown Jewish renaissance. The only existing multi-purpose institution serving Jews who live or work downtown, the centre is showing its age. "After a vital almost 50-year history, it's time for renovation", Sarner says. And expansion — the Bloor JCC is open from dawn to late at night throughout the week and the demand for services and programs has well exceeded its capacity.

Miles Nadal, working in a JTT-directed partner-ship with UJA FEDERATION and the BLOOR JCC, rose to the visionary challenge. "I'm one of a team of many, stepping up to the plate to drive home a game plan for the future," he explains. JTT will oversee the design and establishment of the Miles S. Nadal Jewish Community Centre, a thriving new downtown meeting place, with enhanced educational, spiritual , social and recreational facilities. In addition, the restored centre will house a new theatre, generously donated by the Abraham Green family.

Meeting the needs of Jewish students at Canada's largest university, the University of Toronto, the Wolfond and Koschitzky families have generously helped to construct the Wolfond Centre for Jewish Campus Life. When it is completed, the multi-purpose facility at the corner of Harbord and Huron Streets will provide students with a home away from home. ◆

Putting the* Jewish Toronto Community *on the map!

EXCITING CENTRAL FOCUS

"There's a very palpable excitement being generated by JTT's plans to revitalize the Central Campus. We have already seen significant donor interest in making this vibrant community asset even stronger – a place where we can come together to enjoy cutting edge arts, athletics, social and educational programming."

Bruce Leboff & Joey Steiner
Co-chairs Central Campus Steering Committee

The new JTT Central Campus in the Bathurst-Sheppard corridor, could revolutionize the cultural life of Jewish Toronto.

Projects are being explored that will enhance and enlarge the recreational and communal service programs offered by the Bathurst JCC and Lipa Green Building for Jewish community services. Proposed plans include:

- The creation of a new world-class Jewish facility for arts, culture and learning.
- Enhanced performing arts, visual arts and other cultural programs, together with new facilities including gallery and museum space.
- BJCC will be expanded, enhanced and revitalized to provide greater facilities for its members and the community at large.

She'arim's major move

Jewish Toronto Tomorrow is working to secure funds for an enhanced facility to house She'arim – The Abraham Shore Academy Hebrew Day School for children with learning disabilities – within the Bathurst Jewish Community Centre (BJCC). This move represents more than just finding a facility to accommodate a growing educational need. It means that more children with learning disabilities will receive a Jewish education and it showcases the school to the community, raising awareness of the miracles that happen at She'arim every day. ◆

"She'arim has always been reluctant to turn away any student who would thrive in this special educational environment. With JTT's help, we have 'new doors' we can open that much wider to welcome more students than ever before...the vast majority of these children go on to rejoin the mainstream Jewish system."

Donald Bennett, Chair of Joint Management Committee

Toronto's Holocaust Education and Memorial Centre, housed in the Lipa Green Building at Bathurst and Sheppard, has a North American reputation for excellence in preserving Holocaust history forever.

Enter Jewish Toronto Tomorrow. JTT, working in collaboration with the Centre, is in the planning stages of identifying donors to fulfill the Centre's needs.

"Our recent resource library expansion, thanks to the Ekstein family, is a wonderful addition but will only realize its full potential when we are able to stock it with the reference and resource materials we need. And that takes money," said Holocaust Centre President Howard Driman.

Holocaust Education Week, is the centre's most acclaimed annual program and the need for funding its broad range of special events is extensive.

As we get historically farther from the Holocaust experience, it's becoming increasingly urgent to preserve the stories of survivors. "We are seeking JTT's financial support in finding the funds to record as many of these personal histories as we can, while we are still blessed with the lives of survivors in our midst," says Driman. "In addition to interviewing our 60 or so survivor volunteers, we need to take old audio tapes and digitize them, reformatting them to be accessible to the public as a living resource." ◆

THE NORTHERN DREAM

York Region is home to over 50,000 Jews, making it Canada's fastest growing and it's third largest Jewish community. In order to meet Jewish needs north of Steeles, UJA FEDERATION has purchased a 50 acre site at the corner of Bathurst and Weldrick, (south of Major MacKenzie) for construction of the York Region Jewish Community Campus – another groundbreaking JTT initiative. "If zoning is approved, this land will give rise to an ambitious multi-function world-class development, with community services, recreational facilities, educational centres and housing in one location". says Lou Greenbaum, Chair of the Land Development Committee.

"This will be one of the most exciting development ventures in the GTA and, possibly, the world," enthuses York Region Steering Committee Chair Leo Goldhar." We have done our homework and we are unable to find another initiative anywhere else that rivals our plans for the York Region Community Campus. "

It is hoped that the proposed Campus will house a high school, day schools, day care, affordable housing for seniors, recreational space, a multi-purpose auditorium, a cafeteria, resource library, seniors' centre, cultural centre, green parks, an amphitheatre and commercial space.

Here's how Carole Sterling and Shirley Worth, Steering Committee members express the future. "The York Region Campus is a fantastic dream that projects an amazing and viable reality. The plans for this campus reflect a 'build it and they will come' vision. It's up to us to make it happen. " ◆

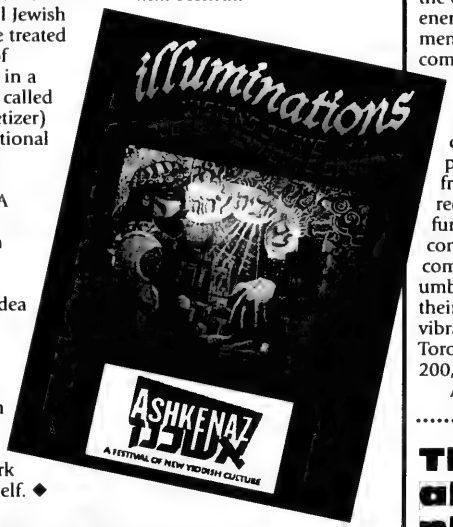
EXPLORING THE JEWISH SOUL

David Buchbinder, the driving force behind the Flying Bulgar Klezmer Band, had a vision. He imagined a grass roots Yiddish festival as a highlight of the summer scene in Toronto. Six years ago that flight of fancy got off the ground in the form of Ashkenaz, a Harbourfront-hosted celebration of Ashkenazi art and culture.

"There is a powerful desire among people of all ages to move past the anguish of post-Holocaust Jewish culture," explained Ashkenaz Chair Helen Daniels. "We're giving expression to the creative talents evolving from where the pre-war Yiddish experience left off. Ashkenaz is the perfect community showcase for Yiddish culture, music, drama, literature, poetry, humour and art."

The next Ashkenaz will be held in 2002 and, with the help of JTT, fundraising for the festival is well underway. Local Jewish students will be treated to the flavour of Ashkenaz 2002 in a special preview called Forspeise (appetizer) — a new educational initiative being developed through the UJA FEDERATION Board of Jewish Education. The novel programming idea would expose students to a taste of the Ashkenaz Festival through special on-site projects and preparatory work for the event itself. ◆



Illuminations, an exciting art show at the Liss Gallery, will be held in May 2001. Proceeds will support the next Festival.

INNOVATIONS IN EDUCATION

Toronto has earned a worldwide reputation for its communal commitment to Jewish education. The UJA FEDERATION Board of Jewish Education (BJE) is continually striving to: identify new trends in education; train and upgrade educators and discover more effective ways to teach in an ever-changing environment, while at the same time bringing students and teachers closer together.

These are the objectives of Midrash: Innovations in Teaching and Curriculum Design – a combined BJE/JTT project. Midrash involves research, creative curriculum development and new teaching techniques in consultation with teachers, students and parents. ◆

"The concept of Midrash suggests creativity and innovation. This is the essence of what our new teaching initiative hopes to bring to Jewish education in the GTA. We are extremely excited to be involved in this endeavour."

THE JTT DREAM TEAM

The work of JTT would be impossible without the commitment and energy of committed members across our community who share both their vision and their leadership. From hands-on design planning to project selection, from research to recruitment, from fundraising to consultation, the committees under JTT's umbrella are tireless in their efforts to build a vibrant future for the Toronto mishpacha of 200,000 Jews.

Alan Sandler, President, UJA Federation, wishes a yasher koach and extends profound thanks to his co-members of the JTT Steering Committee who work so hard, on the community's behalf, to give Jewish Toronto Tomorrow shape and substance: Sandy Brown, David Engel, Leslie Gales, Leo Goldhar, David Goldstien, Paul Morton, Neil Nisker, Barry Sherman and Shoel Silver.

With special appreciation, we also recognize the outstanding service of the growing number of JTT project committees and their members. ◆

There's always a place for YOU

JTT is the most ambitious initiative in the history of Jewish Toronto, bringing together community planning and fundraising in a logical, hands-on, cutting edge way to meet the needs of a dramatically growing Jewish population.

Beyond the Waves

By BELLA BRIANSKY KALTER

The ocean continues to storm and the ship to toss like a toy caught by the waves. Just before dawn, the alert horn wakes them and cousin Lazer bursts into their cabin wearing a lifejacket and helps them all into theirs. When they leave their cabin, they see everyone in lifejackets running excitedly in every direction. On deck, uniformed men line them up in rows, give instructions in English then other languages, including Polish and Yiddish, that everyone stay with their families and keep calm. There is no immediate danger, they are told. In all likelihood they will soon be allowed to return to their cabins. "Remember what I told you, Lilah," Lazer calls to her. "Before you know it, you'll be in Canada with your father."

Lazer's roommate, Manuel, a student from Warsaw, is sobbing like a child, chanting mournfully that he is being punished for leaving his widowed mother behind.

Mrs. Pinsky confesses to her mother that she has been on the brink of starvation ever since her husband emigrated to Canada, where he fell into the clutches of another woman and stopped sending her money. Were it not that she had her dear child to care for, it would be better for her to be swallowed by a shark. Mother, who has been listening patiently, tells her not to talk this way or God might punish all the passengers. Just then, the captain announces that the danger is past and that everyone should return to their cabins.

As the crowd thins out, there is a renewed burst of excitement on deck. Lilah takes hold of Lazer's hand and follows him to where people are gathering. "I'll bet it's Manuel! He's carried out his threat!" Lazer is so upset, he can hardly speak. When they get near enough to hear what the commotion is about, they see that Manuel is being restrained by two of the ship's crew and crying that they should have let him jump overboard.

As Manuel thrashes around, he becomes violently sick so that the two men restraining him must step aside. Meanwhile, the ship's doctor arrives, and the poor yeshiva student who is so limp he now looks as if he were made of rags is led away, feet dragging, to the ship's infirmary. "It's this terrible seasickness that made him go crazy," Mother says later. And Lazer shakes his head to show he knows better.

On the sixth day of the ship's journey, the ocean calms down and the waves are laced with sparkling sunlight. Everyone on the lower deck arises from a drugged state and ventures out of their cabins. Legs feel heavy and numb, everyone surprised at how little strength they have. But their feeble smiles show they are grateful to be up and about. The cook and his helpers smile the broadest at finding their services in demand again.

"You won't be running to the kitchen for lemons for your sister any more," Alex, the ship's steward, says to Lilah when she stops to watch him shine the deck's brass trimmings. "No more lemons!" she says proudly in English. "You see my sister Naomi, Alex? I am looking for her."

Lilah passes the ship's barber shop and sees that all three chairs are occupied. She passes her sister's empty chair and her new friend, Michael, and when she asks if he has seen Naomi, he pretends not to have heard her. She reaches the lounge and hears a muffled sobbing. Naomi sits in one of the armchairs with her head in her hands, and tells Lilah to go away. "Why did we have to leave home – my friend Esther?" Naomi asks, crying into her hands. Lilah is encouraged to come a step closer and tell her Michael is on the deck. "Never mention that dreadful boy's name to me again!" Naomi cries out and Lilah leaves without her.

But later in the day, Naomi consents to take a walk with Lilah. As they walk, the two sisters nearly bump into two boys from Bialystok that Lazer told them about, who are travelling second class. They have come to the deck for a stroll, they tell Lilah and Naomi, hoping to see Lazer and the aunt and young cousins he is accompanying.

"Why so sad?" one of the boys asks, speaking Yiddish. "The storm's over. The sun is shining. In a few days we will reach Quebec. Come... that's better. How would you like to come to our deck and let us show you around?" The boy who has been speaking has brown curly hair and blue eyes and is called Jacob. His friend, Leib, who has hardly said a word but smiles a lot, has blond hair and eyes the colour of amber beads that rich ladies in Poland wear. "Why not?" Naomi responds in her grown-up voice. "Our mother is visiting with a friend and won't miss us."

The two students from Bialystok Polish Halutzim

"The man with the bagpipe – is he also a second class passenger? I saw him playing there, before the storm," Lilah ventures, not to be outdone by her older sister.

"Ah! Mr. McKenzie!" Jacob responds with twinkling eyes. "That was a special treat to distract the passengers from seasickness. Mostly he hides in corners where he won't be disturbed. He's writing a book on British nobility."

Jacob, too, must be a scholar, Lilah decides, as she and Naomi stroll along the deck with Leib at her side and Jacob at Naomi's. Leib is a poet or an artist, or perhaps he's a medical student, Lilah muses, as he points things out to her in Yiddish in a soft voice that becomes a whisper when Jacob is explaining something to Naomi.

After rounding the deck, they enter what Leib calls "the music room." "You will be our guests," Jacob says, pulling a chair out for Naomi followed by Leib who does the same at one of the little tables in the room. Most of them are occupied with chatting people who are eating little iced cakes and drinking coffee or tea. Jacob says they are lucky there is a place left for them.

'Chatting people eating little iced cakes'

A waiter in a black suit appears almost immediately. "Will the young ladies have tea or chocolate?" he asks in English. "Tea please," Naomi says. Lilah hesitates because she prefers chocolate, but tea would sound more grown-up. When, "chocolate please," slips out, and she hears Leib follow with "chocolate for me also," the medley of voices in the room turns into a sparkling music from which first her voice, then Leib's, emerge.

"My father's eyes are golden brown like yours. And yours are blue as the sky and ocean on a sunny day." Though Leib is smiling, when he says this, he looks sad. "If only I were a beautiful grownup woman instead of a dumb child," she wants to say. But what comes out is, "My mother's eyes are the same colour as mine, but I look like my father."

Their refreshments are brought just then, and over drinks and cakes the two students from Bialystok tell the sisters they are travelling to Canada as representatives of the Polish Halutzim, to solicit aid for youngsters who cannot make it to Palestine without help.

"Leib has an influential uncle in Toronto and we hope he can help us in our mission," Jacob explains. Naomi looks down when he goes on to say, "Perhaps you are both too young to be aware of what is happening, not only in Poland, but other countries in Europe as well, particularly Germany. Youths who don't get away soon, may be trapped — as may their parents. Besides, Palestine needs strong hands," he adds in a more cheerful tone.

No hour has gone by so quickly. Jacob announces they had better return the sisters to their mother, or their cousin Lazer will think they have been kidnapped. "We're so glad Lazer and you met!" Naomi and Lilah exclaim together as they descend the stairway that leads to their deck.

"Did Lazer arrange this treat?" Naomi asks shyly. "It was our wish to meet his two lovely young cousins," Jacob assures them and bows playfully, as Leib extends to each of them a cordial hand. When it closes over Lilah's, a wave breaks against the side of the ship, rocking it and throwing them against one another. "Life is like that," Leib says, letting go of her hand. "Sometimes a storm brings us together, and sometimes it tears us apart." Just then Lilah sees a sea gull circling overhead and she wants to tell Leib, but is ashamed to, feeling as if it flew out of their hands as they were saying good-bye.

Triad

This piece was inspired by the biblical story of Sarah and Hagar.

By DEBORAH SWORD

"What's going on?"

Principal Abrams pushed through a ring of children in the playground and pulled the boys apart.

"Both of you to the office. Keep 10 steps apart."

He asked the crowd again. "What's this about?"

Reluctantly one boy spoke. "They're half-brothers and they hate each other."

"I see." He didn't, but it was a start.

The principal followed the boys to his office and shut the door. Facing them from behind his desk, he figured they were about 10 years apart. Normally, boys with that age difference didn't notice each other. Their familial relationship at least explained how they came to fight.

"Do you want to talk to me together, separately or wait for your parents?"

Both boys squirmed and declined to talk.

"Okay. Return to class while I telephone your parents."

He saw them push through the door, glaring at each other. After he had made the calls and arranged a meeting, he looked up the boys' files. Michael lived in a single parent home and had a reputation for being sullen and angry. Mathew, 12 years younger, lived with both his parents and was an honours student.

Mathew's mother, Susan, came late and alone, ignoring Michael's mother, Helen, who had arrived on time. Helen seemed younger to Mr. Abrams, even though her son was older than Mathew. They settled into the same chairs that their sons had occupied earlier. Susan fiddled with her expensive-looking pearl necklace.

"As you know," Mr. Abrams began, "the school has zero tolerance for violence, so I'm hoping we can resolve this situation at this level. We need assurance that today's fight won't be repeated or the boys will be expelled. Where do you want to start?"

Susan began immediately. "Michael is 11 years older and 30 pounds heavier. Start by expelling him for picking on a smaller child. I've been married to the boys' father for 25 years. You figure out the arithmetic."

"You just have to make me wrong, don't you Susan? You not only paint me as the lousy unwed mother who can't control her son but you have to imply that I'm the other woman to your wounded wife. You can't deal with the truth."

Mr. Abrams, taken by surprise, interjected before Susan could respond. "I can see there's history here. I don't want to pry, but perhaps you can tell me enough that we can keep your sons from fighting. Now, from what you've said they have the same father, who is Susan's husband. I make no judgment on that. Let's have ground rules for this conversation, such as no insults, no interruptions. Do you agree to that?"

The two women nodded curtly.

"Good."

"It's true that my son is older, but hers provokes him at every turn," Helen said. "I've seen them together. Mathew plays the prince and treats Michael as a servant. Michael was Susan's idea and now she's punishing me for having him."

Seeing Mr. Abrams' astonished look, Susan explained. "I'd chosen to be a full-time wife. Helen, my best friend, had chosen a career, putting family aside. We were in a café crying over our life choices. Both our biological clocks were ticking. I had a partner, but after years of fertility treatments, couldn't get pregnant. She was fertile but had no partner. We decided to help each other through a surrogate pregnancy."

Susan paused and then continued. "My husband Alex reluctantly agreed and donated sperm. We had legal papers signed but they gave Helen a period of time to change her mind about giving us the baby, which she did. We were furious. Since Alex is the biological father, we won access through the courts, but Helen began lording it over us that she was the mother. My pain was so intense I couldn't look at her any more. I forbade her to come to the house when Michael was with us. I lost my best friend and my baby. It drove a stake into my marriage for a while, but then I got pregnant. Helen got jealous and stopped the access. Alex and Michael haven't seen each other in years. Naturally Michael resents Mathew, who has a father at home. But it's Helen's fault that the boy is estranged from his father. She stopped access."

"Very nice, Susan," Helen said sarcastically. "What a totally warped perspective! Yes, I agreed to the surrogate contract, but you signed it knowing about the opting out clause so that I could change my mind. When I held him in my arms for the first time, I couldn't let him go. I loved you, I wanted to help you. But I loved him more. I was sorry, but I couldn't go through with it. Alex was so angry that he refused to help financially. I was a single mom. I had to go to court to get support, and that's when he asked for access. He had no interest in a baby that wasn't going to be an heir in his home. He stopped the access as soon as he had a son he could show off full time. He'd cut off the support, too, if the court didn't order it. Neither of you cares about Michael as a person. Any baby would do. You treated me terribly and then turned your backs on us when you didn't need us anymore."

This wasn't what Mr. Abrams expected and he wasn't sure what to do. "How long have you known each other?"

"All our lives," Helen said. "We walked to school during the year and swam together every summer at the lake. Susan got married and I went into business so we saw less of each other, but we stayed close. When she was sobbing daily about infertility, I was there for her. We thought it ironic that we were both childless, for different reasons. After going separate paths, we had still wound up in the same place."

Susan sat tight-lipped. "It made her betrayal much harder to forgive."

"It may have felt like a betrayal, but did you ever once stop to consider how I felt?" Helen demanded. "How could I give up that baby after carrying him for nine months?"

"Had you ever intended to, really? Was your offer to carry Alex's child for us just a ruse to get the baby you wanted? Don't bother to answer. How can I trust you?"

"Okay, let's play the blame game for old times' sake," Helen said. "Like we haven't been over this ground ever before. Pretend that I refused the payment you offered for Michael, which I did. Pretend that I did it out of love for you. Pretend that I really love Michael. And then let's look at how you turned your backs on us the moment you found out that you were pregnant. Michael had been seeing Alex every week and suddenly his father didn't love him anymore. How do you think a 10-year-old boy felt? He's never recovered from the rejection."

"Isn't it possible that you're both right?" Mr. Abrams said. "Aren't your two stories the same? Isn't it true that you wanted to help each other? Why else would you have signed the agreement? What happened later can't change the decades of love you had before the contract. Let's assume that you each love and want to raise your sons.

"Susan, could you have given Mathew up? More important than your pain is that your sons are able to understand and take on your anger. One has a mother and father but knows that his father loved another son before him. One sees his father as rejecting him for the other. Each has a pain different from your own but the hurt is passed on from your generation too and is affecting their lives. Can you change it?"

"No. My son is Alex's legitimate child. That's a claim that Michael might have had, but Helen decided otherwise. Michael is stuck with it. If ever the boys decide for themselves that they want to be friends, I won't interfere. Until then, Helen has the son she deceived me to get."

"Will you ever get it that I didn't deceive you?" Helen asked. "You threw me out when I followed my own heart. Does that count for nothing?"

"Nothing."

The principal sighed and looked down, unable to look at the two women. "Then Michael is expelled from school. He has to leave next year for high school anyway, so it's the fairest of the bad alternatives. Mathew is suspended for a week for fighting and on school probation with no extracurricular activities for a month after."

He sighed again. "You've left me no choice but to send Michael away and punish Mathew. I'm sorry, but if you two can't work out your problems, then your children will have to pay the price."

Prayer, A Context

by Lohra Carole Leckner

Prayer is a turning toward God, a relationship,
an unseen dialogue.
He cups your chin wet with tears pulling your face toward Him, raising it,
and sprinkles holy rainwater in multicoloured droplets that feed your essence.

From the Soul of the World came the soul of the world and we entered it smiling, crying. Looking for directions.

He gave it to us
in prayer,
the key to Life in the song of our yearning which has never ceased from the first moment we breathed sanctity, to this.
And in the yearning of our psalm, strumming, drumming, racing in divine chords to join our heartbeat with the heartbeat of creation.

Where are we, in the hand that stretches from Orion to Pleiades, marking the terrain of the universe, the great, giant heart beating with the sounds of the first drum, our mother's heartbeat,
the first violin in the lullaby she sang to us in preparation for our birth.

Our creation in her.
Our giant littleness
of Biblical proportions,
every cell a breath of our knowing, spirit building us from the inside out,
first, and then again,
to emerge full of learning and longing and guileless joy, so full of elevating harmonies
it is an awakening for us to watch the peace and beauty with which a baby sleeps, or plays alive with the utter focus and exploration of possibilities.

In this, of this
(if we would remember it)
we are born into the world.
In a prayer of continuous breath connected with the streaming rays from the cosmos, cupping each moment
as bowl-shaped stars,
a candelabra of light
from the first tabernacle.
Lighting it, being lit, being light, this infant we each are when lit by prayer – to speak with God
in words, beyond words,
in essences,
worlds.

Born to do this,
we grow from being children to being a babe in the universe cradled in His loving arms,
God's own humble child, humbled and willing to begin again.
Again.

Aleinu: Mission Statement of the Jewish People

By RABBI HOWARD MORRISON

A contemporary joke depicts the Aleinu complaining to God why it is recited only once a year when its message is so important. God responds that henceforth the Aleinu will be recited towards the conclusion of every single service throughout the year.

What is the history of Aleinu? How did it evolve so that it wraps up every service? What has Aleinu meant in the past? How does it continue to inspire us today?

The Aleinu was composed in the third century C.E. by the Babylonian sage known as Rav, one of the greatest Talmudic scholars, although there are other traditions of authorship. For example, the Kitzur Shulchan Aruch quotes a tradition which homiletically ascribes the authorship of Aleinu to Joshua.

The Aleinu originated as part of the Malchuyot (kingship) section of the Rosh Hashanah Musaf service. The prayer became very popular after its recitation by Jewish men and women in the town of Blois, France in 1171, who were burned at the stake because they refused to be baptized. They died reciting the prayer. It became prominent during the period of the Crusades when it became the death song of Jews as they were slaughtered for refusing to convert to Christianity.

Aleinu has been used as a closing prayer of daily services since the thirteenth century. It is a statement of belief that Israel has been chosen by God to follow His law, containing the hope that idolatry would vanish and all humanity will worship God. As a concluding vow and expression of hope, Aleinu consists of two paragraphs written at different times, using different styles, and with different messages. The first, which is the older of the two, is a declaration of the uniquely Jewish concept of God.

עָלֵינוּ לְשַׁבֵּחַ לַאֲדוֹן הַכֹּל לָתֵת גְּדֻלָּה לְיוֹצֵר
בְּרֵאשִׁית שֶׁלֹּא עָשָׂנוּ כְּגוֹיֵי הָאֲרָצוֹת וְלֹא שָׂמָנוּ כְּמִשְׁפְּחוֹת
הָאֲדָמָה שֶׁלֹּא שָׂם חֶלְקֵנוּ כָּהֶם וְגֹרָלֵנוּ כְּכָל הֲמוֹנָם:
וַאֲנַחְנוּ כּוֹרְעִים וּמִשְׁתַּחֲוִים וּמוֹדִים
לִפְנֵי מֶלֶךְ מַלְכֵי הַמְּלָכִים הַקָּדוֹשׁ בָּרוּךְ הוּא.

It is our duty to praise the Lord of all,
To ascribe greatness to the Creator of everything,
For He has not made us like the nations of the world
Nor like the families of the earth.
He has not made our portion like theirs
Nor our fate like that of their multitudes,
For they bow down to nothingness and vanity
And pray to an impotent god,
While we prostrate ourselves and bow and kneel in thanksgiving
Before the King, the King of kings,
The Holy One, blessed is He,
Who stretched out the heavens and founded the earth,
Whose glorious abode is in heaven above,
Whose magnificent Presence is in the loftiest heights.
He is our God –
There is no other.
Our King is truth –
All else is nothingness!
As it is written in His Torah:
Know therefore this day and keep in mind
That the Lord alone is God
In heaven above and on earth below –
There is no other (Deut.4:39).

Doctrinal statement, creed, doxology

the God of Israel, the sole Creator of everything, and a denial and denunciation of idolatry. The idols are vanity, nothingness; they do not exist. The Lord alone exists. Twice we are told, "There is no other."

Such a statement could have been written at the height of the conflict between idolatry and Judaism, when Judaism wished to defiantly vaunt its creed in opposition to all else. The possibility that this was composed during the era after the Maccabean revolt (second century B.C.E.), a revolt in which monotheism triumphed over Hellenistic paganism, seems very plausible. This conjecture would support one of the alternative traditions of authorship.

The first paragraph of Aleinu is not technically a prayer. It is not addressed to God. It is a doctrinal statement, a creed and doxology in which we affirm our belief. The text is based on the story of creation. It constantly refers to God as creator and paraphrases the Book of Genesis. This affirmation places the God of heaven, the only God, as the creator of all that others worship as deities.

During the Spanish Inquisition, Christian authorities censored the lines: "for they bow down to nothingness and vanity and pray to an impotent god," which they found demeaning. Though the prayer was written centuries earlier, the Christian authorities were nevertheless convinced by farfetched reasoning of a Jewish apostate who equated the word "vanity" with "Jesus," by Hebrew gematriah (numerology). Note that numerically, the Hebrew word for vanity (varik) adds up to 316 and the Hebrew for Jesus (Yeshu) adds up to 316. Interestingly, outside of Christian influence, in Muslim lands, Aleinu kept its original form. In reality, the censored lines were quotations from Isaiah 30:7 and 45:20 predating Christianity by centuries. The removed verses were originally written against paganism. Today, some prayer books have restored the missing lines.

Most Jews recite at least the first paragraph of Aleinu while standing. One bends the knees at the words "va'anachnu ko'rim," which means "we bend our knees." One then bows at the word "u'mishtachavim," which means "and we bow."

While the first paragraph of Aleinu is addressed to the Jewish people and is particularistic in nature, a second paragraph has been added, which is addressed to God in the second person and is universalistic in nature. In Jewish thought, these particularistic and universalistic concerns are two sides of the same coin, joined by the words, "Al kein," meaning "therefore." Interestingly, both paragraphs begin with the Hebrew letter "ayin" and end with the Hebrew letter "daled," spelling the word "eid," meaning "witness." The Aleinu, like the Sh'ma, becomes a proclamation of faith.

The second paragraph of Aleinu stresses the hope that just as Israel has come to recognize the true God, so in the future, the nations will also recognize God's kingship.

Therefore do we place our hope in You, O Lord our God,
That we may speedily witness Your glorious might
As idols are eradicated from the earth
And false gods are totally destroyed;
As the world is perfected in the kingdom of the Almighty
And all mortals call upon Your name,
Turning unto Yourself all the wicked of the earth.
May all the inhabitants of the world recognize and understand
That every knee must bow to You,
Every tongue vow loyalty.
They will bow and prostrate themselves before You,
And ascribe glory unto Your honoured name.
All will accept the yoke of Your kingship
And You will rule over them speedily and forever.
For the kingship is Yours
And forever shall You reign in glory.
As it is written in Your Torah:
The Lord will reign forever and ever (Exod. 15:18).
And it is said: And the Lord shall be King over all the earth;
In that day the Lord shall be one and His name one (Zech.14:9).

The prayer concludes with the hope "l'takein olam" (to perfect the world). All nations will be bound together, not necessarily as Jews, but in one association leaving idolatry and wickedness and calling upon God's name (Isaiah 2:1-3, et al.) "Then – on that day the Lord shall be one and His name one" (Zachariah 14:9).

The combination of the two paragraphs of Aleinu makes a powerful statement about Israel's belief (first paragraph) and her hope and vision of the future of humanity (second paragraph) – a fitting conclusion to any service of Jewish prayer.

As Rabbi Reuven Hammer writes in his book, Entering Jewish Prayer: "Idolatry in the sense of paganism may have virtually vanished from the parts of the world in which Jews live, and monotheism may have triumphed in the forms taken on by Judaism's daughter religious, Christianity and Islam, but the fight against idolatry and the need to take a stand against it remain as important as ever. The idols of humanity are no longer statues of wood or stone. They are concepts and ideologies that seek to replace the morality of God with the good of the state or of some master race. They include anything that places self-interest or gain ahead of the good of humanity. Fanatic religions are playing an every more powerful role in our world, and they too can become idolatrous, even it they pretend to speak in the name of monotheism. The Jewish struggle against idolatry has yet to be won and the Jewish dream of mankind united in the worship of the Creator of life has yet to be realized."

Don't take this biblical history too seriously

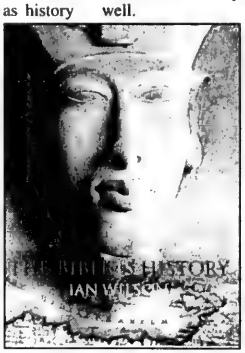
By BILL GLADSTONE

Anyone attempting a serious book about the Bible's status as history steps wilfully into a morass of difficulties.

The first is, what is meant by the word "Bible"? Is it the Tanach of the Jews (consisting of the 24 books of the Torah, Nevi'im and Ketuvim)? Does it include the later Christian testaments? The solution, of course, hinges not on correctness but on identity.

Other difficulties arise over the nomenclature of the land – Israel to the Jews, the Holy Land to many Christians, something else again to the Muslims. Next comes the question of dates: should "common-era" years be indicated as BC, or the more preferable BCE when Jewish readers are meant to be included?

Equally difficult to sidestep are central questions about archaeological dating and Biblical interpretation. Middle Eastern politics also inevitably raises its ugly head as well.



Author Ian Wilson discusses these sensitivities in the introduction to his recent book, The Bible Is History (Weidenfeld & Nicolson, large hardcover, 256 pages). A non-Jewish secularist who studied modern history at Oxford, Wilson strives (not very successfully) to include the Jewish perspective in his assessment of the historical veracity of numerous stories from the Five Books of Moses.

Essentially, Wilson is a New Age theorist with a college degree. Case in point: he links the Jewish exodus from Egypt with the ancient eruption of a Mediterranean volcano at Thera or Santini, which supposedly turned water red, blackened skies, killed livestock and similarly contributed to the other plagues that befell our ancient persecutors. (He does not mention that, according to other New Age theorists, the same volcano caused Atlantis to sink beneath the waves.)

A papyrus rendering of slaves at work.

The Noaitic flood, we learn, could have been no more than the local inundation of the Black Sea that occurred around 5600 BCE, a result of some belated Ice Age backwaters pouring into a natural depression.

Likewise, the destruction of Sodom and Gomorrah was the result of a major seismic catastrophe that caused the bitumen heaps to ignite in uncontrollable inferno. "For any onlooker this may have looked like the sulphurous 'brimstone' raining from the sky, as Biblically described."

In all cases, Wilson's theories and explanations tend to attribute a natural cause to what had been taken as the morally-motivated hand of God.

No less palatable than your average A&E-style Biblical teledocumentary, The Bible Is History is illustrated with attractive photos, maps and illustrations. It makes an intriguing, and at rare moments, even convincing, distraction.

An artifact of a pop culture that gets its learning from the television set, The Bible Is History is equal parts pseudo-history and entertainment. It should not be taken too seriously.

Hannah's Daughter

by Lainie Cohen

1.
In Shiloh, on the temple steps she sits lips moving in soundless prayer.

Begone, drunk woman.

Arms outstretched, beseeching
she kisses
the hem of the robed priest.

'Tis sorrow, not grapes, sir,
for I am barren.

Go home
now, woman.
Your wish shall be granted.

And she named him Samuel borrowed of the Lord.

2.
Like Hannah, I sit in this shrine of healing lips moving in silent entreaty.

Supplication to modern high priests of science with scalpels in hand.

Unwilling to pledge
a son's service
I strike a bargain, a Faustian deal.

And my son escapes, singed in the fire of the lion's den.

On studying Bible and reconstructing biblical history

BY B. BARRY LEVY

A synagogue once invited me to serve as the rabbi for Passover. At the interview, committee members evidenced concern that I might say something heretical while preaching. "Absolutely not," I responded, "but perhaps something controversial." When queried what that meant, I asked the committee how they would react if I said Israelite slaves had not built the pyramids. In horror, they wondered how I could think such a thing. I explained that the pyramids were over 1000 years old when Abraham visited Egypt and therefore could not be his descendants' work; besides, Exodus says the slaves built store-cities, not pyramids. Many already skeptical members of the committee remained unconvinced. Only after the rabbi approved did they hire me and only on condition that I would not discuss the pyramids, to which I agreed because they are irrelevant to the holiday.

At the signing of the Camp David Accords, Begin reminded Sadat how his Israelite forefathers had built the pyramids and Sadat nodded; neither man knew what he was talking about. No matter how deeply entrenched this notion is in the Jewish (or Egyptian) mindset – and the numerous pictures of Israelites building the pyramids that decorate many schools every spring speak for themselves – it is incorrect. This is not a matter of belief, merely an historical fact. But my friends at that synagogue had no desire to correct the mistaken assumptions of their fellow congregants, because they feared jeopardizing their faith. I find that strategy of coping with misconceptions troubling; its implications for writing history are disastrous.

Constructing the history of our biblical forebears is a difficult task that has been attempted often, with differing degrees of success, and one that will be tried many more times without winning unanimous approval. How one approaches the task profoundly influences the results, and lack of agreement on procedure precludes any on the outcome. Bible scholars work from various sociological, literary, archaeological, historical and philological perspectives. Though valuable, each follows assumptions that influence its directions and therefore is of somewhat limited use. The same can be said of readers who approach the Bible from the perspectives of ancient, medieval, or post-medieval rabbis. Each rabbinic writer made specific interpretive assumptions, followed certain methodological dictates, and felt he was contributing something new, or there would have been no reason to write another book or commentary. The issue here is not whether any individual contribution is good or bad. It is the recognition that each differs from all others and is limited by favouring certain types of data, sources, or methods of argumentation and distancing itself from others. This does not suggest all such efforts are equally valid or useful; it does mean we cannot achieve uniform agreement. We can address the issue seriously only through a pluralistic understanding of the problem and its possible solutions.

Various rabbis interpreted creation story non-literally

Dealing with Explicit Narratives and Historical Truths

Were one writing a biography of Abraham against the background of the period in which he lived, one would have to decide, for example, if there ever was a day on which he welcomed three divinely sent messengers. At first glance, Genesis 18 seems quite clear about this, but Maimonides believed that any appearance of an angel was ipso facto the report of a vision, even if the text does not say so explicitly. If he had written the story of Abraham as history, he would have omitted the account. For him, Abraham had a vision of three guests appearing at his tent; they never actually stood there.

Similarly, various rabbinic writers interpreted the Genesis creation story non-literally. This notion is alluded to in Mishnah Haggigah 2:1, but it gained prominence among many medieval philosophers who believed that the world had always existed and not been created. Maimonides rejected this argument on philosophical grounds but added that, were he convinced of its validity, he would have interpreted the creation story non-literally, just as he required with all references to God's corporeality.

Did Maimonides deny the truth of these biblical passages? No. But he assumed their real intentions and proper interpretations were best determined in the light of truths that could be established from non-biblical and non-rabbinic teachings. Centuries later, Spinoza criticized this approach to the Bible. For him, the text had to mean what it said, and one was obliged to accept or reject it on that basis; the subjective Maimonidean reformulation of a text's meaning in the light of later thinking was highly inappropriate.

This example is complicated by the fact that Maimonides was one of the greatest medieval rabbis, while Spinoza was a controversial philosopher excommunicated by his local rabbinic court and now almost universally disparaged in religious circles. But it is Spinoza who gave primacy to the literal reading of the biblical text (as did some of Maimonides' rabbinic critics) and Maimonides who allowed for multifaceted, contextualized interpretation that takes account of extrinsic data. We can choose between these positions on the basis of their sponsorship or on the basis of our assessment of their intrinsic merit, or we can develop another alternative, but the history we write will depend on the choice.

Filling in the Gaps in the Bible's Reports

A history of biblical times must recognize that the Bible reports little about most people mentioned in it and almost nothing about the early years of its heroes' lives. It contains virtually no stories in which children under the age of seventeen are the main characters or serve as role models. This may seem odd, because so much time is spent making these stories meaningful to children, but the fact stands. What do we do about the missing pieces of our history? Should we fill in the gaps with midrashim and aggadot?

'Midrashim were created to expound, expand, enhance'

For the most part, midrashim were recorded by rabbis who lived between 500 and 1000 CE (roughly 2000 years after Moses). Undoubtedly, many contain pre-rabbinic material, but midrashim were created to expound, expand, enhance, glorify and apply the Bible, and to squeeze every possible nuance into and out of its text. Were they intended to provide historically valid information? And if they were, are halachic Jews bound to accept highly creative midrashic exegesis and historiography?

This matter was debated extensively by the medieval rabbis and has continued to engage more recent ones. In general, legal matters presented by midrashim were considered binding by rabbinic Jews and disavowed by Karaite Jews (who rejected most rabbinic interpretations of the Bible that could not be substantiated from within Scripture). The rabbis treated non-legal midrashim in at least three different ways. Many geonim (leaders of Babylonian Jewry roughly a millennium ago) and Sephardim answered subjectively, suggesting that we accept what makes sense and not rely on the rest, or that midrash and aggadah are conjecture, individual opinions, and not binding. Others preferred their rigid acceptance but ran into difficulty when they contradicted each other. Some valued midrashim but understood them non-literally, when a literal reading seemed impossible (thereby approaching midrashim as some rabbis approached Scripture). Whatever we prefer, in the Middle Ages there was no requirement to rely on midrashic interpretations or to use them to fill in the gaps in the Bible's history.

What about filling in data from ancient non-biblical sources? If archaeologists find a text about a biblical character, should it be included in our history of biblical times or allowed to influence the presentation of biblical material? Archaeology is a relatively new endeavour, and while documented examples from pre-modern times do exist, we can find a precedent that parallels our ability to use truly ancient texts largely in some rabbis' use of non-traditional, post-biblical texts. Thus, Ibn Ezra, Nachmanides and others cited books about biblical events (usually preserved by Christians) in order to enhance their understanding of ancient times. Maimonides suggested we could better grasp the rationales behind many biblical laws if we knew more about antiquity. He searched pagan books for (what he assumed was) information about ancient paganism in order to reconstruct the contexts to which the Torah was directed, at least in the first instance. Many writers applied medicine, mathematics, astronomy, and other sciences to understanding the Bible. Arabic speakers often compared Arabic, Aramaic, Hebrew, and other languages to explain words or constructions in biblical Hebrew. This model suggests the legitimacy, even the necessity, of seeking Bible-related information from non-traditional sources.

Unfortunately, archaeologists have found no texts from early biblical times about the patriarchs, Moses, Solomon, or any other early figure. In fact, the only pentateuchal character mentioned in any non-biblical document from early biblical times is Bilaam, so our hypothetical history of the Torah period cannot exploit non-biblical texts to fill in historical gaps. We can use ancient artifacts and documents to clarify practices, to understand the life styles of biblical people, to visualize the houses they inhabited and the clothes they wore, and to reconstruct the cities in which they lived, the roads on which they travelled and their neighbours' religions. But we lack material that can augment what the Bible tells of their personal lives.

Archaeological discoveries aid understanding

Later times are quite different. Many biblical kings are named in contemporary Assyrian texts, and Sennacherib's siege of Lachish (a biblical fortress-city southwest of Jerusalem) is depicted on a carved stone mural in this Assyrian king's palace in Nineveh. Texts from all over the Middle East relate directly to biblical events or augment our knowledge of them. Should we use them?

Scholars are thrilled to find such texts, because, despite any shortcomings or biases they might exhibit, they are new, authentic and ancient evidence on the Bible. Many prefer them to biblical texts or allow them to control the interpretation of any related Bible passages. William F. Albright, who revolutionized American study of the Bible in the third quarter of the twentieth century, was often teased about looking for the emigration papers issued to Abraham by the mayor of Ur Kasdim. That is how seriously he took the biblical accounts and archaeology's ability to confirm them. Some scholars are more skeptical, but almost no one denies the value of ancient Near Eastern discoveries to elucidating the biblical world.

On the other hand, religious writers often decline to exploit these materials. Some behave this way because their teachers did not use such texts; others, because they are not part of our sacred literature. Some do so because they believe the Bible needs no validation or augmentation from pagan sources; still others, because reliance on such texts now, even for positive reasons, may compel the use of others not yet discovered that inevitably will cause problems later. (Those who know nothing about these texts are not entitled to a vote; ignorance is never a virtue to be idealized.)

I find these reasons unconvincing, particularly given the use of analogous texts by authoritative rabbinic interpreters. Besides, fear that later discoveries will contradict the Bible demonstrates weak faith in the Bible's historicity! Even so, how each document could or should be used remains a subject of debate.

The more ancient artifacts and texts we discover, the more we can understand real life in the biblical orbit; this process is enriched annually by archaeologists who dig in and around Israel. What happens if we find nothing relevant? An argument from silence is weak, but the real issue is how what we fail to find relates to what turns up and to the Bible. Tel Harasim is the modern name of a Judaean town located near the Philistine border during the period of the biblical kings. We know it was not Philistine, because all its pottery was of Judaean, not Philistine, styles. Moreover, almost all animal bones discovered there are sheep, goats, and deer; the others, largely wild animals. Unlike the Philistines, who left many pig bones, it seems the Tel Harasim residents ate what we call kosher animals. Sometimes the absence of data has positive implications.

Now what do we do about the lack of discoveries that confirm the stories in the Torah? As noted above, Bilaam is the only Torah character who appears in an early non-biblical text; David is mentioned in only one reference to the Davidic dynasty. Over the years, this debate has varied tremendously. Those who do not trust the Bible argue that the lack of supporting evidence undermines its credibility; their position seems confirmed by the inability of archaeologists to verify (at least at this time) many of the Bible's presentations. Those who do trust it are encouraged by discoveries that include references to biblical people, places, and events. Sometimes discoveries suggest new ways of understanding biblical texts and events, but only readers who limit their interest to interpretations from a pre-archaeological age should find this troubling. Of course archaeology cannot confirm everything. Sometimes it seems best to wait for potentially relevant new information; other times, to reinterpret the Bible in light of these temporary conclusions and the strategies used by our rabbinic predecessors.

Two serious efforts operating to destroy Bible's credibility

The Present Interpretive Challenge

Legitimate challenges to a literal-historical reading of some biblical narratives led many rabbis to suggest that some passages were best understood non-literally or non-historically. Saadiah was one of the first to discuss this systematically. He argued that the text should be taken literally unless it was contradicted by another verse, or it disagreed with logic, sense perception, or tradition. One can unpack each of these categories further (for example, Saadiah may have intended the last to apply only to legal matters), but globally they support a rational reading of the text. For Maimonides, what appears as narrative and therefore at first reading as history may be interpreted most effectively some other way. When such opinions could not be sustained through creative literal or hyper-literal reading, other forms of interpretation would be applied. Often this necessitated redefining the nature of the passages (without altering their literal meanings), which effectively removed them from the category of history and relabelled them. Usually terms like prophecy, vision, dream, and parable were used, and collectively this repertoire of responses provides an interesting strategy for dealing with biblical reports that, for whatever reason, modern readers may find difficult to accept at face value.

Rabbis who approached the Bible this way knew of skeptical attitudes like those at large today and realized the potentially unsettling implications of their position. But they did not shrink on that account from what they perceived as the best way to interpret the text, and one must assume they meant their explanations to be taken seriously. Perhaps they believed such responses were the only way to overcome rational objections to a literal reading and simultaneously to retain a commitment to many of the Bible's stories. Most pre-modern writers did not think in strictly historical terms, but if asked to recount what happened in antiquity, they would have responded in a variety of ways. They believed God had revealed Himself through many forms – recorded law, poetry, and narrative and oral communications – and they responded to this notion in their own unique and creative ways. Many taught that the interpretation of the Bible and the reconstruction of ancient events demanded that texts be made to reflect realities not always equivalent to their literal meanings. As troubling as this was and may remain for some people, it is nonetheless an important part of classical rabbinic thinking.

Interpretive challenge

The interpretive challenge before us today resembles the one our rabbinic predecessors faced, but modern literary understanding of the Bible necessitates a slightly different formulation of it, because we generally describe non-historical narratives differently from the way they did. Assuming we are convinced by internal biblical inconsistencies, by reason, by science, or by verifiable facts that a biblical narrative cannot be taken at face value – as our great rabbinic predecessors sometimes were – will we stand by the straightforward meaning of the text and faithfully demand its acceptance, even if many people will be unable to take it seriously? Will we move to a midrashic presentation, which may distance the text from its original context and meaning? Will we suspend judgment and wait indefinitely for new discoveries we hope will confirm our beliefs? Or, reacting to these contemporary but not unprecedented challenges, can we acknowledge that, at times, divine teachings may have been revealed through allegory, parable, or other literary devices broadly categorized as fiction?

The Politics of Reading the Bible Today

These and other questions, and the brief and therefore inadequate answers offered above may upset some people, but the problem we face today is much more severe than what I have described as essentially an internal Jewish debate about strategies of interpretation and historical reconstruction. In our generation, two very serious but inadvertently complementary postures are working to destroy the Bible's credibility. On the one hand, some Jews insist that the primary, if not the sole purpose, of all biblical narratives is to instruct us about religious thinking and behaviour today. They regularly present the ancients as moderns, whose presumed thoughts are informed by contemporary knowledge and whose actions are understood to have been motivated by considerations identical to those we confront. Following this time-honoured homiletical practice, these readers disassociate biblical characters from ancient reality and make them think and behave like ideal Jews of later times. To this notion such readers often join the belief that midrashic interpretations are, and always were, intended to be taken as history, and so they abandon the Bible's literal and historical meaning in the name of creative rabbinic interpretations and applications. They thereby decline, in the name of piety, to see the Bible as reflecting the real lives of ancient Israelites. On the other hand, an increasing number of university-based individuals arrive at the same position by a totally different route. They argue in the name of archaeology that virtually nothing in the Bible is historical and that all biblical narratives were composed at the end of the biblical era and bear no resemblance to historical reality. These individuals are actively destroying the Bible's credibility as a reliable document about ancient times, and they do so with zeal that exceeds mere academic exuberance.

Literal meaning now appropriate

While these two programs of misreading the Bible originate in unrelated arenas and have different – indeed, strongly opposed – raisons d'etre, they both wrench the text out of context and discredit its historicity. They also join forces in undermining the claims of the modern State of Israel, which sees itself as the legitimate heir to the geographic, cultural and national legacies of biblical times, and justifies this claim partly through archaeology and the historical reading of many biblical passages, particularly those about the period of the monarchy.

The most appropriate response to this attack on the Bible may seem to be a return to reliance on the literal meaning of seemingly historical texts. This might help temper midrashic excesses, but is only part of the answer, because non-literal readings may be preferable in some contexts. Many post-modern challenges to the Bible cut deeper. Because they assume the Bible is completely false, they reconstruct ancient history only from carefully chosen and massaged non-biblical sources, even as they exaggerate the significance of the archaeologists' failure to discover independent confirmation of many biblical narratives.

During the nineteenth century, texts from biblical times discovered in and around Israel were regularly declared forgeries, because scholars could not imagine recovering authentic documents from that era. Now some academics are convinced that collective failure to find material or textual confirmation proves the Bible is not history. Such claims are more than an intellectual exercise to determine what the text says and what happened. They serve a clear political agenda to delegitimate the State of Israel and reinforce Palestinian anti-Zionism. This position claims the Palestinians are the historically valid heirs to the Land of Israel, stolen from them by colonizing Western powers motivated by a search for their spiritual roots. It was bestowed on the Jews, who, according to this view, deserve none of it, because (despite the acknowledgment of most Western Bible critics and Christian theologians) the Israelites never possessed it. Some people claim ancient Israel's homeland was in another country altogether! These arguments are the latest volley in a long history of biblical criticism (whose support of the Bible and hostility towards it ebb and flow with remarkable variation). But at the present time they are only distantly related to several millennia of non-historical readings of the Bible designed to serve Christian purposes (also with varying degrees of support, malice and influence). Significantly, they are an important dimension of a shifting field of engagement that sees classical commitments of Christians and Jews pitted against those of Muslims and of a realignment that sees the Land of Israel changed from an ancient region contested by competing Asian and African interests to a modern one whose domination is coveted by Asians and Africans, on the one hand, and Europeans and Americans, on the other.

If the Bible characters were not real participants in the ancient world (as many latter-day midrashists seem to suggest), and the reconstructed history of biblical times cannot be trusted (as the minimalist anti-Zionists say), the only rationale for Jewish sovereignty in Israel is de facto control, which is all that ever mattered anyway to some people and itself is under constant attack. Never mind that there are strong, convincing, scholarly reasons why these nihilistic readings of the Bible and of archaeology are wrong. The political agenda gets the media attention and dominates everything else.

Historicity of many parts of the Bible confirmed

Ultimately, archaeology and non-Jewish texts confirm and complement the historicity of many parts of the Bible (particularly the period of the monarchy and later), but unfortunately only non-biblical material has any credibility in these debates. We cannot rely on the Bible or its classical commentaries, because they have been declared suspect and irrelevant, but, even so, we should never abandon either. Much of the Bible is defensible as history, if we understand how to read it and how to differentiate between those parts that are and those that are best not taken that way.

Equally important, we must demand the submission of other competing documents to similarly rigorous analysis. Such consistency would have very significant implications for the one obscure sentence in the Koran (17:1) that allegedly alludes to Jerusalem and is used repeatedly to validate the Palestinian claim to the Temple Mount. Such weak supporting evidence could never survive any serious academic critique (in contrast to the many biblical passages for which extrinsic support is much stronger). And some advocates of the Palestinian claim therefore bolster their position by attempting to denude the Temple Mount of all evidence of early Jewish presence there. Of course, the Israeli rabbinate's failure to find a spiritual use for that space, the marginalization of those who think they can and should, and the secularist Israeli disinterest in the whole area intensify the impression of its having no value to Jews and only exacerbate the problem, indefensibly playing into the hands of Israel's enemies.

Were we convinced by these competing claims, we might eschew Zionism, accept the non-historical quality of the Bible, use the allegorical methodology of Maimonides and his followers to free us from its literal meaning, apply wantonly and destructively the notion that the Bible contains some fiction, and allow total escape into the fantastic midrashic readings of biblical narratives. This would complete the pious reformulation of the Bible's heroes as denizens of another world, complement the abandonment of Scripture and its legacy to other interests, and even allow both secular and religious Jews to go about their business unencumbered by the Bible. But to do so could be the single most self-destructive act in the history of the Jewish people.

What should be done about finding the best way to read the Bible and responding to this political situation? Most people prefer one simple answer to these questions and one permanent strategy for coping with such challenges, but these matters are too complex and too volatile to address that way, and avoiding them merely exacerbates the situation. The Jewish community treats Holocaust denial with the utmost seriousness, though it is patently absurd. Bible denial is far easier to sustain, has the potential to do far more damage, and goes unchallenged (if not tacitly accepted, even supported) by many Jews – in some instances, ironically and tragically, in the name of piety. To respond, we must understand the problem, recognize that standards of judgment evolve, appreciate the strengths and weaknesses of each claim and counterclaim, and stay abreast of new developments and arguments. Above all, we must maintain a concerted effort to study the biblical and non-biblical texts that inform this debate, and we must remain ever dedicated to seeking the truth. We have long understood that every engaged Jew must be a politician and fundraiser for Jewish causes; now, everyone must also be a Bible scholar.

Barry Levy is professor of biblical studies and dean of the Faculty of Religious Studies at McGill University.

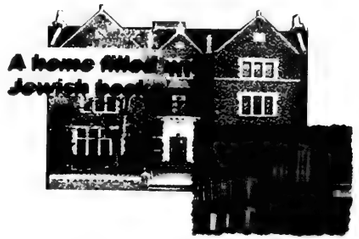
We should give to others out of a sense of responsibility, realizing that what we have is also a gift from G-d, granted to us with a purpose, so that we will help others. Our prosperity is a trust which we must steward and generously share with those in need. The Tzedakah campaign calls for an increase in giving and also the conspicuous display of a Tzedakah-box to serve as a reminder to give often every weekday. And our Sages told us: "Tzedakah is great, because it brings the Redemption near." By showing generosity to our fellow men, we anticipate G-d's ultimate generosity and bounty.



An environment teaches. What you have in your home helps determine what type of home you will have. By having sacred Jewish books conspicuously displayed at home, you and your visitors will be prompted to use them.

Moreover, their very presence reminds us of their contents and the importance of Jewish values. Of course, the more books the better. However, the minimum of a Chumash (the Five Books of Moses), a Book of Psalms and a Siddur (Prayer Book) are suggested.

Light is a subject which has stirred the imagination of poets, scientists and psychologists. Because its nature is so different from other material entities, it is frequently used to describe the spiritual.

Shabbos is a day of light; a day with a different pattern and value-orientation than our ordinary weekdays. For every Shabbos is a foretaste of "the day that is all Shabbos and rest for life everlasting," the era of Mashiach. The lighting of the Shabbos candles 18 minutes before sunset ushers in and inspires this state of awareness. The responsibility for lighting the candles and inducing this change of perspective is the woman's.

It is she who welcomes the Shabbos Queen into the home. Young girls from the age of three are also encouraged to light their own candles so that they too can have a share in creating this environment.

Eating kosher food enables us to identify with our Jewishness on a very basic and fundamental level. As long as our Jewish involvement is limited to prayer, study, or even specific ritual acts, it is spiritual, above our normal day-to-day reality. When you eat differently because you're Jewish, your commitment is not merely metaphysical, but part and parcel of your very being.

This orientation will reach its ultimate expression in the Era of the Redemption when G-dliness will permeate every element of our experience. Kashrus and other mitzvos which involve the material dimensions of our experience foreshadow the approach of this age.

The observance of Kashrus consists of eating only Kosher foods at home and away from home. It also entails not eating dairy and meat foods together, and maintaining separate dishes, cutlery, and utensils for meat and dairy.

The Torah perspective on married life Marriage and sexuality are treated very carefully by the Jewish tradition. It is no coincidence that in Torah-conscious homes the divorce rate is much lower than the national average. Taharas Hamishpochah, the attitudes and practices for the Torah prescribes for married life, help to develop genuine communication and love between husbands and wives and bring to the world healthy loving children. Taharas Hamishpochah is not only for couples who have been brought up in a Torah environment. On the contrary, couples from all walks of life have adopted this mitzvah as a means to enhance and enrich their married life. Taharas Hamishpochah literally translates as "family purity." Its observance hastens the fulfillment of the prophecy "I will remove the spirit of impurity from the land."

Just One More Mitzvah!

Precipitating The Promise

We are living in a unique era. We are producing more than enough food to feed all of humanity. Robots and machines are able to perform most tasks for which physical effort was necessary in previous generations. Instant video communication from one end of the world to the other is a reality. Resources of knowledge that have been collected for centuries are now accessible at the click of a button. For the large majority of mankind, peace and prosperity are taken for granted.

Nevertheless, although the benefits which we appreciate may even exceed our parents' fantasies, there appears to be little change in the human condition. If science, technology, and economics have provided us with the backdrop for a Utopian existence, the foreground - the keys to give us depth, awareness, and meaningful happiness - is still lacking for many. The Rebbe, Rabbi Menachem M. Schneerson, focuses on this paradox, telling us that we are living in the Era of the Redemption. Mashiach is no longer a dream of the future, but a reality that is unfolding before our eyes. And yet, to precipitate this process of change, mankind must open its eyes, expand its thinking, and uncover the inner G-dliness that permeates our existence.

Catalysts for Change

Such spiritual effort may seem daunting for many. This is one of the reasons why Judaism is a religion of deed. Together with spiritual and ethical goals. G-d gave us specific actions to observe-which nudge these goals into fulfillment. This is the intent of the Mitzvos.

The Hebrew word Mitzvah relates to the word tzavta meaning connection. Every mitzvah is an act of connection linking us to our Jewish heritage, the spiritual core of our soul, and to G-d Himself. Performing mitzvos endows our lives, homes and communities with increased warmth, sensitivity, depth and joy.

Ten-point Mitzvah Campaign

Approximately 20 years ago, the Rebbe inaugurated a ten-point mitzvah campaign. The campaign focuses on Ten specific mitzvos, through their fulfillment, the individual and the family will come to a greater appreciation of their Jewish heritage.

Anticipating the Imminent Redemption

Maimonides writes that a person should always see himself and the entire world as equally balanced and with one positive deed, one can tip the balance and bring salvation for the entire world. The Rebbe declared: " Moshiach is ready to come. All that we have to do, is to add in acts of Goodness and Kindness". Let that act be yours!

לע"נ מרת מרים בת ר' אליעזר

Rabbi Akiva (one of the greatest sages of the Talmud) explained that the love for our fellow man is "one of the leading principles of the Torah." A campaign for Ahavas Yisrael means that we make an effort that our thought, speech and actions be permeated with a real concern and sensitivity for the well-being of our fellow Jews. These efforts share a connection to the Redemption because the love and care we share with others in the present age will lead to the all-encompassing love that will characterize the Era of the Redemption.

The campaign for Torah education seeks to involve any and every Jewish child in an educational program that will teach him/her what it means to live as a Jew. Education is not only for children. Adults are encouraged to enroll in study groups and seminars commensurate with their background and knowledge.

Torah is the medium of communication through which G-d enables man to know Him. The campaign for Torah study encourages every individual to set fixed times for Torah study every day so that our spiritual growth and development can be systematic and directed. Rabbi Schneur Zalman of Liadi, the founder of the Chabad-Lubavitch movement, explained that Torah study should be fixed not only in time, but also in soul. It should be the vortex around which the entire spectrum of our day-to-day experience revolves.

This prepares us for the explosion of knowledge that will highlight the era of the Redemption when "the Jews will be great sages and the occupation of the entire world will be solely to know G-d."

The Torah describes Tefillin as a sign, a public statement of Jewish involvement. By donning Tefillin daily, an individual gives expression to his basic feeling of Jewish identity, and its importance to him. The Tefillin are placed on the arm facing the heart, and on the head. This signifies the binding of one's emotional and intellectual powers to the service of G-d.

The straps, stretching from the arm to the hand and from the head to the legs, signify the transmission of intellectual and emotional energy to the hands and feet, symbolizing deed and action. Our Sages explain that the verse: "And all the nations of the world shall see that the name of G-d is called upon you, and they shall fear you" applies to tefillin. Tefillin are a medium to bring safety and security to Jews in the present era and hasten the coming of the ultimate security which will be experienced in the Era of the Redemption.

And you shall write them on your doorposts of your house and on your gates. (Deut. 6:9;11:20)

A Mezuzah designates a house (or room) as Jewish, it reminds us of our connection to G-d and our heritage.

By placing it on the doorpost, we declare that this is a house or room where the word of G-d and his Torah influence our behavior, thus rendering it a Holy dwelling.

A Kosher Mezuzah is a small parchment scroll handwritten by an expert scribe, which contains two Biblical passages, Shema and Vehaya im Shamoa.

On the reverse side of the parchment are written three Hebrew letters שדי - This is an acronym for the Hebrew words "Guardian of the doors of Israel". The Mezuza protects the inhabitants while in and out of the house.

It is also an acronym for three figures in Jewish history associated with kingship, the first Temple and redemption - Yishai (King David's father), King David and King Solomon.

SAME WEEK, TWO PHOTOS: These two photos, both taken last week, starkly depict the different values underlying Palestinian and Israeli societies. The photo above is of the friends and classmates at the funeral of young Naftali Lantzkoren, who was murdered by a suicide bomber while waiting for a bus to take him to school. Jews, Kremlin: uneasy relations

By ELIAHU SALPETER
Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

Two-thirds of the Jewish pupils in Moscow hide the fact that they are Jews, according to a recent survey, the Moscow-based journal, Komersant reported last month.

Of the respondents, 13 percent said they always conceal their ethnic identity, five percent said they do so frequently, and 50 percent said they do so sometimes. Only 32 percent said they never hide their Jewish identity. Although surveys indicate there was a slight decline in the number of violent attacks against Russian Jews in 2000, apparently, Moscow's Jewish schoolchildren know precisely why they should keep their Jewish identity a secret.

Backgrounder

The government of President Vladimir Putin has publicly shown sympathy for Judaism, but he himself has failed to take action against anti-Semitic incitement throughout Russia, especially in provincial towns whose mayors are known anti-Semites. Police have not intervened in a large number of neo-Nazi incidents, and anti-Semitic statements have been made by organizations and movements affiliated with the Russian Orthodox Church.

The News in Brief

CANADA

Meeting With Day

OTTAWA — Canadian Jewish Congress (CJC) president Moshe Ronen and incoming president Keith Landy led a recent delegation in a meeting with Opposition leader Stockwell Day. "We thanked Mr. Day for his forthright and principled support of Israel and discussed a variety of other priority issues on the agenda of the Jewish community," Ronen said. The meeting also focused on racism and discrimination; Holocaust remembrance, including the establishment of a museum of the Holocaust and human rights in Ottawa; Nazi war criminals in Canada; the upcoming UN conference on racism and its potential anti-Israel politicization; national unity; and funding for Ontario Jewish day schools, which Day favours.

ISRAEL

Poll Findings

JERUSALEM — In a recent poll of Israelis, 56 percent of those surveyed favoured the evacuation of Jewish settlements in the event Israel redraws its borders without negotiating with the Palestinian Authority.

Killer Arrested

JERUSALEM — Palestinian security sources said they arrested a Fatah activist who shot and killed an Israeli infant in Hebron last month – but not for the killing. Ha'aretz quoted the sources as saying that a Palestinian intelligence officer who killed 10-month-old Shalhevet Pass had been arrested on unrelated charges.

Guards Released

JERUSALEM — Israel released three members of Palestinian Authority President Yasser Arafat's elite Force 17 guard arrested recently by the army. The IDF said an investigation cleared the three of allegations they had engaged in terrorist activities. Three other seized members of the presidential guard remain in custody.

Suspect List

JERUSALEM — The Simon Wiesenthal Centre has submitted to the U.S. Office of Special Investigations a list of 31 suspected Lithuanian Nazi collaborators who immigrated to the United States after World War II. The centre said the list includes people suspected of serving in local police units that persecuted Jews in Lithuania and Ukraine.

WORLD

War Criminal Out

WASHINGTON — Juozas Naujalis, a former member of the Nazi-backed 12th Lithuanian Schutzmannschaft Battalion, was deported recently from the United States to his native Lithuania. The removal came after a U.S. court found that the battalion assisted German units in the execution of over 11,000 men, women and children. Naujalis, a retired machinist living in Chicago, is the 54th suspected Nazi war criminal removed from the United States.

Cuban's Call

HAVANA — The president of Cuba's parliament called for the withdrawal of Israeli troops from the West Bank and Gaza Strip. Speaking at a meeting of legislators from around the world, Ricardo Alarcon also said Israel "should take the necessary measures to stop the brutal repression of the Palestinian people."

Warning Reviewed

WASHINGTON — The U.S. State Department is reviewing the travel warning it issued on Israel shortly after Palestinian violence erupted last September. Late last month, the assistant secretary of state for Near Eastern affairs, Edward Walker, acknowledged the impact the advisory has had on tourism to Israel.

Kristallnacht Claims

BERLIN — A German document recently obtained by the Jewish Agency for Israel shows Jews are owed $270 million (US) in today's currency to cover insurance claims for destruction caused during Kristallnacht, the night in 1938 when Nazi thugs ransacked Jewish-owned shops and torched synagogues across Germany and Austria.

CJC Meets With Red Cross Officials

OTTAWA — Canadian Jewish Congress president Moshe Ronen and incoming president Keith Landy led a recent delegation in a meeting with Armand de Mestral and Pierre Duplessis, president and secretary general, respectively, of the Canadian Red Cross Society (CRCS).

On the agenda were two key issues: full membership of Israel's Magen David Adom (MDA) in the Federation of Red Cross and Red Crescent Societies, and the safe return of Israel's missing-in-action soldiers and others kidnapped by Hezbollah terrorists.

Ronen noted that there is momentum building toward the adoption by MDA of a new symbol that would fulfil the criteria for membership in the Red Cross. However, he added, efforts are still needed because the Swiss government, in view of the Israeli-Palestinian situation, indefinitely postponed a conference scheduled for last autumn that would have set the stage for the MDA's admission.

Lord's Prayer divides Nova Scotia MLAs

By JOEL JACOBSON
Atlantic Correspondent

HALIFAX — Members of the Nova Scotia legislative assembly are divided over the use of the Lord's Prayer in the House.

"Prayer is supposed to bring us together," Tory MLA Mark Parent, a Baptist minister, says, "but now it's a symbol of division... It distresses me that prayer is becoming a divisive issue."

Sheva Medjuck, president of the Atlantic Jewish Council (AJC), says her organization plans to work with other faiths to find a House of Assembly prayer for all Nova Scotians.

Medjuck responded Sunday, April 1, to comments by Brooke Taylor, a Conservative (and governing-party) MLA who said earlier that it's time minority religious groups respected the majority.

Most Nova Scotians are Christian and the Lord's Prayer (as a start to each day's proceedings) is a long tradition in the House, Taylor said.

> 'Prayer is supposed to bring us together...but now it's a symbol of division'

Several weeks ago, the only Jewish member of the House, Howard Epstein, NDP member for Halifax Chebucto, said all forms of prayer should be removed from the Legislature. He was reacting to a case currently before the Ontario courts in which Henry Freitag, a Penetanguishene, Ont., resident, is requesting all prayer be removed from Queen's Park. Epstein's remarks generated heated debate in newspapers and on radio talk shows.

A request to examine other Canadian legislatures' positions on prayer in the Nova Scotia legislature was turned down on Thursday, March 29.

Medjuck said the AJC believes it is "inappropriate" for the Lord's Prayer to be exclusively used by an institution purporting to represent all Nova Scotians.

"If prayer is to be used, it should be used in such a way that it is representative of our province's religious diversity," Medjuck said. "We hope other faiths will be supportive of us."

Taylor, the House deputy speaker, reiterated that while he respects other religions, the majority of people in Nova Scotia are Christians. To say anything other than the Lord's Prayer would be watering it down to make it more acceptable to some minority groups, he told the Chronicle-Herald.

Epstein said he "fully expects various religious groups will weigh in on [Medjuck's request for support]. It's only 52 people [as legislative members] and what they do, but it's 52 people who are representatives of the whole province, so it deserves to be scrutinized."

He said the committee's decision to not even acknowledge the possibility of a problem was narrow-minded. Taylor said the committee decision was made in a democratic way.

Parent, who says he's incorporated other faiths' words into his own prayers and sermons, hopes the discussion will lead to a solution that respects everyone's beliefs.

"There's a chance here for compromise. Most people are supportive of prayer and acknowledging a higher power."

Premier John Hamm has indicated it's no secret he's in favour of tradition, including the saying of the Lord's Prayer.

NOW THAT'S WHAT I CALL A TABLE
by Rose Romberg

Momma dropped two hot glowing bricks over cast-iron pots and pans soaking in the galvanized tub sitting on the floor.

Steam hissed with an explosive sound. Water gurgled and bubbled.
The ritual koshering on the threshold of Passover was done.
I remember. I was only three but I remember.

Our spacious one-roomed house and all therein scrubbed from ceiling to floor.

Papa brushed breadcrumbs off the four corners of the table with a long goose feather he had gathered, then burned the chametz. "We praise You, O Lord, Who hallows us with Your commandments."

I was three years old.
I watched and I listened.
And I was in awe.

Papa went off to the steambaths.
Momma bathed her four little girls, dressed them in white-starched pinafores she had sewn that year.
She had scrimped and saved
groshen for new shoes and blue and white ribbon for our hair.
We sparkled and glowed within and without.

Momma went to the mikvah.
She returned and donned her dusty-rose crepe de chine and velvet dress; her sheitl washed and styled. Her eyes shone, her face glowed.

"Now, kinderlech, we will set the table so all will be in readiness when Papa comes home from shul."

On the table we placed Momma's white, appliqued cloth (a wedding gift) and on it we placed the large silver tray (an heirloom) and on it was placed Elijah's koyse. Wine filled to brimming. His mysterious presence is felt at every Seder table.
Baruch habah b'shem HaShem.
(Welcome in the name of the Lord.)

And on the table was placed a koyse for Zaidi Yitzchak, Bubbie
Sarah, Papa, Momma and four little girls. And on the table were placed three matzahs wrapped in a white satin coverlet embroidered with gold thread sewn by Momma's loving hands. (Two matzahs to remind us of Festival Days of the ancient Temple and one extra matzah, symbolic of Passover.)

And on the table was placed the Seder plate. On it, a scorched shankbone (the ancient Passover sacrifice), parsley (the green hope of renewal, springtime), horseradish (the bitter life our forefathers suffered in Egypt), charoset (the mortar, slave labour under Pharaoh's reign), a roasted egg (symbolic of life, a triumph over death).

Papa entered the house, grand in his black silk kaftan and white yarmulke.
His coppertone, freshly groomed beard, his usually clouded eyes shining. He was suddenly transformed from a humble man to a priestly image, as he took his place at the head of the table.

This vision I can still see.
Momma lighting candles, white silk lace shawl draped over her head and shoulders.
Three times her arms circled the flickering flames.
She covered her face as she ushered in the first Seder with her blessing.
Baruch ata... asher kiddeshanu B'mitzvotav v'tzivanu l'hadlik ner shel yom tov.
(We praise You, Lord, majestic
Sovereign of all life
Who hallows our lives with commandments and bids us kindle the festive holy light.)

Momma removed her shawl
Her eyes glistened though tears
Her lips said: Gut yom tov, Papa, Gut yom tov, kinderlech.

Papa stood up with koyse in hand,
His eyes alight with exaltation
He recited Kos Kiddush
(the first cup, the cup of sanctification).
We joined in, Ani... v'hotzeiti etchem mitachat sivlet Mitzraim.
(I am the Lord and I will free you from the burdens of the Egyptians.)

A Woman of Valour

by Howard Kurlandski

To whom do men croon each Friday night
The ideal of womanhood, and all that is right
He looks across the table, to that wondrous smile
And drinks in the beauty of his aishet chayil.

As she make the brachah, outside turmoils cease
With thoughts of chesed, family, and peace.
Each candle kindled, each flickering flame
Ushers in the kedushah of His holy name.

The songs she sings, each sweet rendition
Brings us closer together, in sacred tradition.
A woman of valour, where is she found
Deep in my heart, where love abounds.

USCJ addresses issues of Conservative lay leaders

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — In a long-anticipated meeting, lay leaders of Conservative congregations here and senior representatives of United Synagogue of Conservative Judaism (USCJ) discussed issues that the lay leaders of seven local congregations raised formally in a December letter to Stephen Wolnek, USCJ's international president.

"We had a full airing of the issues, [including governance, staffing and assistance to congregations] and we've agreed to meet again," said Robert Feldgaier, president of Beth Tikvah Synagogue, of the meeting held at Adath Israel Congregation.

In a column in the February issue of his shul bulletin, Feldgaier wrote about "whether we are getting value for our membership in USCJ." In fact, the Beth Tikvah board of governors has authorized withholding of dues payments for the 2000-2001 year until matters are resolved to their satisfaction, he wrote.

After Feldgaier invited his Toronto counterparts to a meeting in December to discuss mutual concerns, they agreed to sign a joint letter. "[T]he feelings expressed [at the December meeting] were that the USCJ was not meeting the needs of our congregations," he told congregants in his column.

"The participating synagogues expressed concern that the member congregations have little say in how our dues are spent by the USCJ and with the apparent lack of accountability of the leadership, both in New York and Toronto to the member congregations," he wrote.

Some of the issues were approached at the Conference for Leadership of Large Congregations, held in Toronto in January.

At the time Wolnek said changes would be forthcoming to improve user-friendliness for the congregations. He described USCJ's services, including assistance in leadership development and congregational programming.

The Canadian region, which was formed two years ago from the merger of the former Ontario and Eastern Canada regions, still does not have a constitution, which would be subject to the approval of USCJ's international office, Feldgaier told The CJN.

"In our view most of the services are best delivered at the regional level," said Feldgaier. As an example he noted that his synagogue and others could use assistance with their youth programs.

"The whole purpose of the merger was to be able to provide services more efficiently," Feldgaier said. "Our interest is in improving the way things operate and strengthening the long-term future of the movement."

Forming a new set of bylaws and setting in place parameters for transfer of leadership for the merged Canadian region has "dragged much too long," said Wolnek.

He expects to have the issues addressed within a couple of months, he said in a phone interview last week. "If a constituent raises a question, it deserves an answer."

Wolnek said the tone of the meeting was "excellent. Everyone was sincere and respectful."

He said that USCJ is also looking at ways to address budgeting concerns for Canadian region. Shirley Gossack, executive director of the Canadian region, also serves as its youth director; the budget is "not adequate to support more [staff]," Wolnek said.

Because the Canadian region represents a relatively small number of congregations (22, compared to USCJ's largest region, New York Metropolitan, with 109) its budget is relatively smaller than that of its American counterparts, explained Wolnek. Dues being based in part on the number of congregants, "per capita it does not allow [the region] to function as efficiently from a financial point of view as some of our other regions."

Canadian regional president Gabe Grushcow – who was elected on what was expected to be an interim basis at the time of the merger – was reluctant to comment on what he called "internal matters," but said meeting participants were anxious for "a pleasant conclusion, and I think it's going to work out that way."

Forum studies Jewish identity

By LEILA SPEISMAN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Jews are expert at building community through crisis. Now they must become expert at building community through abundance, says the director of leadership and communities at CLAL – The National Jewish Centre for Learning and Leadership, based in New York.

Never have Jews been so free or so affluent, Rabbi Brad Hirschfield told The CJN during an interview on a recent trip to Toronto.

On the other hand, he added, many don't know what to do with that good fortune, Jewishly speaking.

"We live in a Jewish world where people who know how to delve deeply [into Judaic thought] understand Judaism in a narrow way, while those who go wide, don't feel deeply rooted in thousands of years of wisdom."

CLAL believes that you can do both, following a philosophy the rabbi describes as "one mountain, one Book, one people, many voices.

"They try to assist this development in several ways; a think tank, the Jewish Public Forum; working with rabbis; and building a community "animated by expansiveness."

The purpose of the forum, Rabbi Hirschfield said, is "to generate new ideas and new thinking about Jewish identity, spirituality and community in light of new political, technological, economic and social realities."

It is an opportunity for people "with nothing to do with organized Jewish life, but are nevertheless proud of their Jewishness and who normally have no place to play out their Jewishness."

Members include an astrophysicist from University of California at Berkeley, a political philosopher from Harvard University, and people from government.

If those in the Jewish Public Forum are "the ultimate outsiders," then rabbis are "the ultimate insiders," according to Hirschfield, who insisted "we won't be a healthy people without a healthy rabbinate."

CLAL sponsors what he said is "the only transdenominational" rabbinical internship. There are representatives from all four religious streams (Orthodox, Conservative, Reform and Reconstructionist), as well as women from Drisha, an Orthodox program of advanced Torah study.

Rabbi Hirschfeld

Rabbi Hirschfield objects to using the word "tolerance" as a goal of the program. "We speak of openness, not tolerance," he insisted.

"There are things that we don't agree with in each other's point of view, and that's fine, so long as we respect those views."

The idea is not only to learn about other denominations, but to learn from them.

There are also yearly retreats, with over 400 rabbis connected in some way to CLAL taking part.

CLAL aims to build "a community animated by expansiveness."

The point is not to give up either the old traditions or the new ones, said Rabbi Hirschfield. "We must use the past as our most holy resource, and together with modern experiences, opportunities and leadership, build a secure future."

There is a cadre of young, wealthy Jews in the North American community, he said, who have "tailor-made everything," and need to tailor-make their Jewish expression to be meaningful to themselves.

CLAL works with federations or small groups in various communities (it has just begun baby steps in Toronto) to encourage this – not, he hastens to add, to necessarily make them observant, but to make them Jewishly conscious.

Staff from CLAL, by invitation, come to the community and give lectures, seminars, Shabbatons, and just plain chat sessions in federation offices and private homes. "If I believe, and I do, that Torah is infinite, how could there not be a role for each person to play out their Judaism?"

Asked why he thought there was so much division between Orthodoxy, Reform and Conservative Judaism, Rabbi Hirschfield said that it goes back to his original statement that Jews don't know how to perpetuate Judaism from a standpoint of success, rather than persecution.

"We are afraid that we are even more vulnerable now, and we are afraid that our particular understanding of Judaism won't be preserved."

Then, since "we are too afraid to admit that we feel vulnerable, we attack [those with different views and approaches.]"

Only 35 percent of Jews are even in one of the mainstreams – "the rest say a pox on all their houses."

Just think, the rabbi urged. "If we were good to each other, that 65 percent might find a place for themselves."

Mazon Canada milestone is a bittersweet event

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Milestones like birthdays, anniversaries or records reached are usually keenly anticipated and provide an excuse for a party and celebration.

When Mazon Canada reaches a milestone, however, it's usually a bittersweet event. On the one hand, Mazon can boast of new highs in the generosity of its benefactors; on the other hand, it also means the need for the organization's largesse – hunger in Canada – has not abated.

Mazon Canada recently announced it had distributed its three millionth dollar as part of its fall round of allocations to grass-roots organizations and food banks that feed the hungry.

Since its inception in 1987, Mazon Canada has consistently boosted its allocations on a semi-annual basis, with the fall 2000 distribution of $348,730 lifting the total past $3 million.

Altogether, Mazon allocated $674,132 in 2000, about $140,000 more than in 1999, which in turn had marked the high water mark of Mazon allocations up to that time.

"We are sad to say that the number of Canadians requiring our help has not declined," said Jacqueline Kott-Wolle, executive-director of Mazon Canada. "It seems more and more families and individuals are in great need."

In addition to funding food banks – Mazon's traditional beneficiaries – the organization also supported Out of the Cold programs, children's breakfast clubs, Passover basket programs and street relief efforts that delivered food to homeless people living on the streets.

Mazon has also focused on children under five, "a population deemed to be most at risk, since children under five do not attend school full time and therefore do not have the benefit of organized breakfast and lunch programs," Kott-Wolle stated.

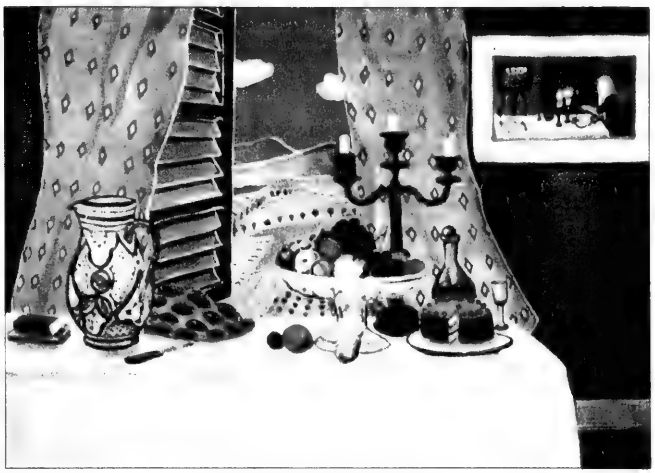
Mazon raises funds through the generosity of donors who are presented with a number of options for contributing to the charity.

Supporters can tithe their food and entertainment bill from simchot for Mazon; they can purchase place cards and greeting cards; they can send a cheque; or they can support one of two large-scale community fundraisers that have channeled hundreds of thousands of dollars to Mazon coffers.

Mazon's seventh annual Montreal Food Fest, held in November 2000, raised more than $200,000. Caterers donated their wares to the event and a large number of volunteers organized food tastings and a silent auction.

The third annual Kosher Gourmet Gala at Roy Thomson Hall in Toronto, held on March 26, was expected to raise $80,000 for the fight against hunger.

Mazon distributed funds to about 160 organizations across Canada on a non-sectarian basis. Fall allocations ranged from $500 (Oasis Christian Outreach Centre, Lasalle, Que.; Resources Jeunesse, St-Laurent, Que.) to $6,000 (Bikur Cholim, Toronto; Tomchai Shabbos, Toronto).



Mazon Canada greeting card.

Others to receive Mazon funds included: Fort McMurray Food Bank Association, Fort McMurray, Alta., $3,000; Goldstream Food Bank Society, Victoria, B.C., $2,500; Pedvac Foundation, Port Elgin, N.B., $3,500; Jewish Family and Child Services, Winnipeg, Man., $4,000.

Funds were also allocated for international relief, with the Canadian Red Cross receiving $1,000 for El Salvador earthquake relief and $1,000 for India earthquake relief.

For more information, Mazon can be reached in Toronto at 416-783-7554 or in Montreal at 514-931-6000.

Is there no relent in his politics from pettiness?

Most Canadians greeted the news of last week's federal government appointment of Roy Romanow to lead a special commission of investigation into Canada's health care system with enthusiasm and hope. We share those sentiments.

There can hardly be a more important subject for Canadians. No issue affects our lives so directly, so fundamentally as the availability and quality of health care services. No aspect of our lives brings us into as compelling a confrontation with the ultimate issues of human existence as the failure or the lack of those services.

There can hardly be a more qualified Canadian than Roy Romanow to head up that commission. Throughout his long career of public service, Romanow has been an intelligent, articulate, passionate defender of the medicare system. He has a genuine, deep desire to improve the system for the benefit of all Canadians along with a broad understanding of the issue's complex, legal ramifications upon federal-provincial affairs. No statement attests more forcefully to Romanow's suitability for the task than his own at the press conference after his appointment. "Medicare is more than just an insurance program, it is also a testimonial to the beliefs and values of Canadians everywhere."

Nor can there hardly be a more appropriate time than now to examine the current state of our health care. Public confidence in the system is at an all-time low. It is costing more and delivering less. We are an aging society, just barely through the doorstep of a new century, having to face industrial, sociological, technological and environmental changes unimaginable even one generation ago.

The mandate of the commission is sufficiently wide to support a comprehensive, imaginative, innovative, "outside-the-box" approach to finding solutions for our health-care problems. Canadians need the commission to think boldly and to act bravely.

Yet the reaction to the announcement by Quebec premier Bernard Landry, was very petty and more the pity for being so. Landry not only condemned the very idea of the commission, he also condemned the man appointed its head. "The appointment of Mr. Romanow doesn't look for us as a very useful thing. To start with, he symbolizes in his person the centralist movement in Canada," Landry said.

Landry could not set aside his extreme partisan views even on the issue of health care. He immediately declared his government would not co-operate with the commission.

Even acknowledging the disagreement with Ottawa on the issue of jurisdiction, can he not, nevertheless, still act for the greater good of all Quebecers? Is co-operation so totally anathema to separatist ideology? What does Landry achieve by setting his loyalty to separatism above his loyalty to the wellbeing of all Quebecers?

Is there no relent in Landry's politics from pettiness and spite?

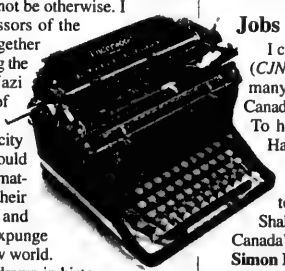
Human history must move forward

It has been reported that some third-world nations, abetted by some Muslim states and diverse free-floating sovereign states, all egged on by the former Soviet Union, will meet this summer at the upcoming UN Conference on Human Rights in Durban, S.A. to excoriate those who allegedly still practise slavery and racial discrimination, or may have done so in the past.

It has also been reported that a cry is likely to come for compensation, not only from the Americans for the injustices arising from slavery, but also, for good measure, from the Israelis, for the "racism" engendered by Zionism and now inflicted on the unfortunate Palestinians.

Unlike any other people in history, the Jews have been traumatized for over two thousand years by an unrelenting anti-Semitism. No wonder they sought a haven in their ancestral homeland from the evil that has pursued them for so long! It could not be otherwise. I cannot recall the predecessors of the countries now huddling together having done anything, during the recent dark years of Nazi butchery, to stay the hand of the butcher.



As for American complicity in the evil slave trade, it should be remembered that an estimated million Americans lost their lives and untold property and wealth in the civil war to expunge the slave trade from the new world.

A cut-off line has to be drawn in history to separate past events from those of today. We cannot hold modern Americans responsible for the misdeeds of their forefathers, just as we cannot burden modern Germans with the heinous deeds of their fathers and grandfathers. If not, Egypt could soon be faced with horrendous claims for compensation from the people of Israel for the bondage suffered by their forefathers in the times of the pharoahs.

There is only one way to strive for human betterment: move forward.

Arafat's choice

When the peace talks came close to fruition, Arafat – who had expected them to fail – was panic-stricken. His choice was very clear: end the conflict and lose his position as warlord, or continue it and remain leader of a society where hatred, death and false hopes dominate. Since the end of the conflict would put an end to Arafat, he proceeded to make impossible demands he knew Israel would reject. Fighting is his raison d'être; witness his ineptness as a diplomat.

Jobs for Conservative women rabbis

I concur with my friend Neil Loomer's letter (CJN, March 22) wherein he states that there are many Conservative egalitarian synagogues in Canada with rabbinic positions currently available. To his list should be added Shaar Shalom in Halifax, Nova Scotia, which at one time, did have a female Conservative rabbi.

I, too, would urge any Conservative rabbi to contact the search committee at Shaar Shalom, Halifax. Come and enjoy the lifestyle in Canada's ocean playground!

Annan's statement deplorable

Koffi Annan, the secretary general of the UN, stated, if I heard it correctly, that the Palestinians have every right to criticize Israel. Such a statement is clearly an endorsement of Arab actions, and in the current explosive atmosphere in the area is tantamount to incitement for the ongoing Palestinian violence.

Coming from the head of the institution purported to promote and maintain peace and harmony between people, such words are deplorable, to say the least.

Democracy and citizenship:

The search for coherence in modern Israel

By BENJAMIN ARCHIBALD

Rarely, if ever, does an Israeli politician make a major policy address without appealing to Jewish unity. It is a theme of increasing popularity in the current Knesset, where a "unity" government under the stewardship of Prime Minister Ariel Sharon has acceded to power.

Unity is a positive development when it is based on a shared approach to government rather than a shared self-interest in governing. Despite Sharon's seasoned and steady hand, the government is not unified in its underlying philosophies or approaches to the future of the Jewish State. One need not dig deeply beneath the surface to see that substantive unity has become a political buzzword that is unlikely to be respected in practice. Whether left or right wing, secular or religious, Israelis demonstrate a common characteristic: they all seek to unite the country on their own terms. Some Shas party members have been known to refer to sitting prime ministers as "goats" and "foxes" while prominent left-leaning professors place blistering ads in the country's newspapers attacking the haredi community.

The cycle repeats itself daily within Israel's institutions of government and before the Israeli High Court of Justice, where an existential battle is raging over the identity and soul of Israel as a Jewish and democratic state. The hard line secular parties Shinui and Meretz speak in increasingly radical tones about "unity" being possible only through a clear separation of synagogue and state. The religious parties counter that Israel will only be a true Jewish state when it openly advocates and applies Jewish law. One concept of unity is fueled by anti-religious animus, the other by an anti-secular one. The mainstream Likud and Labour parties do little to mediate between the two, as they are often required to vacillate on Judaism and state issues in order to maintain a semblance of control over their coalitions. This is evidenced by the fact that Sharon alienated his natural allies in the National Religious Party and Gesher while Shimon Peres did much of the same to Meretz and Shinui in order to enter the current "unity" government.

The prospects for Jewish unity seem dire indeed. Perhaps it is because Israeli democracy has yet to mature, understanding the limits of social unity in a democratic state. Israelis often lament the nation's fractiousness, longing for the days when Mapai dominated the Knesset of Israel's longest serving Prime Minister David Ben-Gurion. Historical memory is selective; few in Israel remember Ben-Gurion's campaign slogan of a coalition bli Maki ve bli Herut (without the communist party or the pre-cursor to the Likud party), effectively delegitimizing the parties to the left and right of his own.

In the state's early years, Mapai did enter into coalitions with the religious party Agudat Yisrael, reaching many of the "status quo" agreements governing the relationship between the religious and secular elements of Israel's public life. Yet today's state does not reflect the early years of Mapai dominance. Since Menachem Begin's victory in 1977, the Israeli Knesset has increasingly reflected a true representation of Israeli society: multi-ethnic, diverse and fractured.

Yet despite the character of the Knesset and the diversity of Israeli citizens, all parties speak as if they are the sole representatives of what Israel should be, often leading to rancorous and angry debate. This debate has become increasingly aggressive in light of the 12th Knesset's adoption of Basic Law: Freedom of Occupation and Basic Law Human Dignity and Liberty. These laws reference the values of the state of Israel as a "Jewish and democratic state" and as a result, they have placed the central question of the Zionist enterprise into a normative legal framework. Some herald these Basic Laws as a constitutional revolution, entrenching core civil liberties into Israeli public life. Conversely, political scientist Dan Avnon argues that the "Jewish democracy" equation should not have been foisted on the courts; he notes the "deleterious effects of the Israeli legislature's decision to burden Israeli courts with the responsibility to grant positive meaning to the expression of Israel's values as a Jewish and democratic state."

The Knesset is where Israel's diversity often finds its most emphatic expression. Sitting shoulder to shoulder in the Knesset chamber last year were, left, Yossi Sarid (Meretz) and Eli Yishai (Shas).

Emboldened by the Basic Laws, parties can come before the court and speak of their "rights" in a democracy or their "rights" in a Jewish state. As Canadian historian Michael Ignatieff notes, "rights" talk places strain on social unity: "One of the ironies about rights is that people who win theirs don't necessarily want anyone else to have them." This is demonstrated by fractures in Israeli society anchored in the simultaneous suspicions that democracy requires an abandonment of the state's Jewish character and that Judaism requires the imposition of theocracy.

Although Avnon's analysis accurately describes the current level of debate in Israel, an angry one pitting democracy against Judaism couched in the assertion of "rights," his prescription is flawed. Israel should not abandon the constitutional revolution in favour of the political-backroom dealing that managed the secular-religious divide without addressing or solving any of the core existential issues facing the state. To the contrary, the revolution should continue, but the shrill rhetoric must be lowered through an appeal to democratic culture and responsible government, two criteria that are rarely exhibited in the current political atmosphere.

Democratic culture and civilized debate require that the parties necessarily step back and look to other nations in order to better understand democracy's nature and its ability to reflect the philosophical conception known as the "good life" – that is, the nature, values and character of a state. Much as like the Israeli Supreme Court has placed great emphasis on the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms in its interpretation of Israel's Basic Laws, Canada's political philosophers can play an integral role in defining the need for civilized debate in democratic regimes.

Like Israel, Canada is constantly managing diversity. The Canadian political debate is premised upon vastly divergent views on the role of the federal state vis à vis multicultural communities and both the aboriginal and French-Canadian minorities. The enactment of the Canadian Charter of Rights sought to manage diversity through the creation of a pan-Canadian identity anchored in rights shared across the country. Not unlike Israel's Basic Laws, the Charter introduced a rights debate into Canadian political discourse, often exacerbating tensions between English Canada and the province of Quebec. Although the tone of the Canadian debate is not comparable to the level of abuse Israeli parliamentarians hurl at each other across the Knesset floor, the Charter and its aftermath has led many in Canada to articulate a commitment to deep diversity.

Deep diversity requires that citizens of a democracy recognize that a nation is composed of diverse groups who see, understand and conceptualize the role of the state in diverse ways. In effect, social unity does not lie in the "good life" shared by all citizens. To the contrary, social unity lies in a common respect for multiple approaches and positions on the good life. As philosopher Will Kymlicka notes, "For citizens to want to keep a multi-nation state together, they must value, not just deep diversity in general, but also the particular immigrant groups and national cultures with whom they share a country."

Although the challenges facing Israel are different than those facing Canada, Israel should take note of Kymlicka's argument. Citizens of a state cannot impose their views on others under the banner of social unity. The irony of the unity debate is that it requires Israelis to abandon rhetoric and begin speaking to each other as people who are products of diverse communities, education systems and levels of observance. Unity can only be attained through a recognition and appreciation of the rich array of Jewish and democratic values present within Israel's constituent communities. Anchoring the values of Israel as a "Jewish and democratic" state in the Basic Laws is a positive development as long as the country's citizens realize that these principles should not compete with each other but compliment one another.

The late Chief Rabbi of Israel, Rav Isaac Halevi Herzog, may have been unrealistic in his dream of an Israeli state deeply rooted in Jewish law, but he, rather than western academics, clearly articulated the role Judaism could play in informing the values of a democratic society. No legal brief or philosophical treatise captures the noble challenge of Jewish democracy as eloquently as Rav Herzog. The debate, then, must be guided by his instructive counsel: "Our state will be a democracy and must maintain its democratic nature. Our wish, our ambition, is that it be a democracy in the spirit of authentic Israel, in the spirit of 'and you shall love your neighbour as yourself.' And of 'justice, justice shall you pursue.'"

Unity in democratic Israel requires respect for a diversity of opinions and beliefs on the nature of Jewish values and their role in state life. It does not mandate that the secular Meretz party and the religious Shas party agree on the meaning of Judaism and Zionism, nor that the Likud and Labour parties agree on the future direction of the peace process. It requires respect for the primary values of principled democracy: a commitment to dialogue and the rule of law. Love your neighbour like yourself but do not force him to become yourself. This is what a commitment to Jewish democracy requires.

The Afghan puzzle

For a while, the media paid a great deal of attention to a campaign by Afghanistan's Taliban who were destroying huge statues of the Buddha because they saw them as idolatrous.

Rabbi Gunther Plaut in Toronto

Appeals came from all over the world trying to persuade them that such wanton destruction would destroy great artisitic and historical monuments. Surely, they claimed, in the 21st century there is no room for such a narrow view of religion.

The fact is that to the Muslim Taliban, in their superstrict interpretation of Islam, the statues are more than a gross symbol of idolatry. There are very few, if any, Buddhists in the country, and such destruction is primarily designed as a demonstration of power. The Taliban are fundamentalists who are bent on revolutionizing society. They consider the education of women dangerous and are banning television in all its forms. Cutting down huge statues under the guise of religious purity is to show that they are taking their drive to rule the country seriously, regardless of what "degenerate" Westerners and other opponents are saying. The Taliban remind their countrymen that Soviet Russia once occupied much of Afghanistan but had to retreat after years of bitter warfare.

Afghanistan has, in fact, been the scene of bitter wars for more than a quarter of a century. The nation holds the unenviable record of producing the single biggest and oldest refugee population in the world and, in addition, the country is now in the grip of a terrible drought that has left a trail of death and destruction in its wake. Crops have failed and rivers, dams and wells have dried up, seriously reducing the number of much needed cattle.

In addition, the approximate 4,500,000 Afghanis who fled back in the '80s when the Soviets invaded the country and are now trying to return are finding little besides poverty and civil war. Refugee camps are spread all over the land, but while formerly they were visited and served by aid workers and dignitaries from various lands, they are now sliding into the realm of total neglect, forgotten by the world. No wonder the infamous terrorist, Osama bin-Laden, can live there in splendid isolation.

Since 1948, most Afghan Jews have left for Israel, but we have little knowledge of who is left behind. Their land is a place of terrible strife, prejudice and misery. It is easy to get exercised over the destruction of monuments, but harder to take a real interest in alleviating the country's slide into total dysfunction. It is one of the tragedies for which the world has no time.

Only Israel decides on its capital

There they sit, words on a page, jumping out at the reader. In black and white, the sentences ooze with absurdity, straining one's faculty of reason. Recently, while perusing Israel's two English-language newspapers, I came across something that left me scratching my head in amazement.

Robert Sarner in Jerusalem

On the front page of the Jerusalem Post, the headline read: "Powell calls Jerusalem Israel's capital." On the same day, Ha'aretz ran a similar story; the lead sentence stated: "U.S. Secretary of State Colin Powell referred to Jerusalem as 'Israel's capital' during discussions in the foreign affairs committee of the House of Representatives."

Sitting in my home in the city in question, I didn't know what to think.

Topping the news of the day, a senior U.S. official had stated a simple, well-established fact – Jerusalem is the capital of Israel.

Now there's a revelation.

How does a comment like Powell's merit such prominent coverage? Is it really newsworthy that a member of the U.S. government points out something that has been true for more than half a century? Sadly, I suppose so.

The earth may still be flat for some people, but one fact is not going away: Drum roll, please for factoid 101. In December 1949, Israel's first prime minister David Ben-Gurion declared in the Knesset that Jerusalem is the capital of Israel. That's the way it's been for 51 years.

The Arabs may refuse to acknowledge it. The Palestinians may have their own designs on the city. Europe may be uncomfortable with it. The United States may keep its embassy in Tel Aviv as most countries do. The United Nations may repeatedly cite UN Resolution 181 calling for the internationalization of Jerusalem. Foreign media may sometimes refer to Tel Aviv instead of Jerusalem when speaking of Israel. But none of this changes the reality that Jerusalem is Israel's capital – whether the world likes it or not.

To be sure, the status of Jerusalem is a highly volatile and contentious issue. It is a major obstacle to improved relations between Israel and her Arab neighbours. The world's one billion Muslims consider Jerusalem's Temple Mount sacred to their faith and reject its being under Israeli control.

Although less demonstrative, much of the Christian world is ill-disposed to Israel's being in charge of Jerusalem, home to many sites that are holy to Christianity.

Still, like every country, Israel decides where its capital is regardless of how it plays abroad. And surely if any people has a strong, time-honoured claim to Jerusalem, it is the Jews.

Within days of taking office in January, U.S. President George W. Bush reaffirmed his election campaign pledge to move the American Embassy to Jerusalem from Tel Aviv. He said he's committed to ending a situation that is an insult to Israel's sovereign right to choose its own capital. He stated as much again in response to reporters' questions during his White House meeting with Prime Minister Ariel Sharon last month.

Welcomed words from Israel's supposed best friend. Just don't hold your breath. We've heard it all before. Bush said that once in office he "will begin the process of moving the U.S. Embassy to Jerusalem." He's clearly in no hurry.

Process is the operative word. It resurfaced again when Colin Powell told congressmen: "President Bush is committed to moving our embassy to Jerusalem. The process is ongoing." Such a process, of course, can be stretched out for years if Washington so chooses, as demonstrated by Bill Clinton. Such are the promises of politicians.

Canadians, too, know all about it. In 1979, Joe Clark promised voters that if he was elected prime minister, one of his first foreign policy initiatives would be to transfer the Canadian Embassy to Jerusalem from Tel Aviv. No sooner was Clark elected that his words turned to mush as he caved in to Arab pressure.

Lamentably, after all these years, Ottawa and Washington steadfastly refuse to move their embassies even to west Jerusalem, which, unlike the eastern part of the city, is not contested by the Arabs.

Today, only two countries continue to stand up to Arab threats and maintain their embassies in Israel's capital. Costa Rica and El Salvador may be small in size, but their courage, sense of decency and loyalty to Israel are enormous – and not sufficiently recognized.

Arafat: in Pharaoh's footsteps

At first glance, there would appear to be very little in common between the biblical portrayal of Pharaoh, the ruler of mighty Egypt, and Yasser Arafat, the head of the corrupt and decidedly unmighty Palestinian Authority. However, on closer examination, there is a striking similarity between Pharaoh's inability to change his pattern of behaviour in order to save his kingdom, as one plague followed another, and Arafat's unswerving march from one failure to the next.

Gerald Steinberg in Jerusalem

In the case of Pharaoh, the cost to Egypt, or rather to the leadership, during the first five plagues was high, but apparently not unbearable. While Pharaoh initially appeared to be willing to consider Moses' relatively minimal request to allow the Israelites to depart for three days to worship and sacrifice to God, when the individual plague ended, "he hardened his heart" and said no.

However, by the sixth plague, it was God who hardened Pharaoh's heart, indicating that the Egyptian ruler had lost the ability to control his own decisions. The cost of each plague then increased dramatically, leading to the climax in which the Israelites departed triumphantly, not for three days of worship, but to freedom and escape from the bondage of Egypt.

According to Jewish tradition, the "hardening of Pharaoh's heart" was a reflection of a pattern of behaviour that was so deeply ingrained it could not be halted. In the rational dimension, Pharaoh was fully aware of what was happening to his kingdom, and his advisors warned him to let the Jews go before Egypt was destroyed. Yet in his confrontation with Moses, he could not allow himself to back down, even in the most minor way. By the eighth or ninth plague, Pharaoh must have known that the end was near and inevitable, but like an addict, he could not bring himself to quit.

Similarly, Arafat has demonstrated, once again, that the terrorist that began his career in 1964 has not, and cannot, change. The diplomatic process that began in 1993 with the signing of the Oslo agreement on the White House lawn was a performance, designed to project an image of the "new" Arafat transformed from terrorist to statesman. In truth, the language, the uniform, the gun in the pocket, and the hatred have never changed. Like Pharaoh, going through plague after plague, Arafat repeats the same phrases ("the peace of the brave"), but continues to drive headfirst into full confrontation.

The cold-blooded murder of Shalhevet Pass in Hebron last week, was not an isolated act, but rather the continuation of Arafat's terrorism for its own sake. For over 70 years, the Palestinians have based their policies on violence, including the 1929 Hebron massacre, but they have few gains to show for thousands of murders. Jews have not been frightened into leaving; claims in the Land of Israel, including Hebron, have not been renounced or forgotten; and the return of the Jewish people has continued to accelerate. Like Pharaoh in Egypt, who in plague after plague, was psychologically unable to make the decisions necessary to cut his losses, Arafat is trapped in the self-perpetuating cycle of terrorism.

When the Israelites crossed the Red Sea and saw Pharaoh's army drown as the waters crashed upon their chariots, the links with Egypt were severed completely. Despite the close proximity and the periodic nostalgia for the watermelons and cucumbers of Egypt, the Jewish people were constantly reminded of their suffering and slavery. Many generations passed before "normal relations" could be resumed.

Similarly, as long as Arafat is the leader of the Palestinians, there will be no peace and no end to terrorism. The events of the past year demonstrate, without a doubt, that the search for formulae for "permanent status" and acceptance of a Palestinian state are irrelevant. Once Arafat and his generation depart, and a new leadership arises, it may be possible for Israel and the Palestinians to renew the attempts for mutual acceptance and accommodation. However, for now, Arafat's heart, like Pharaoh's, has been hardened.

The Kirshner File

Should Israel allow the PA to collapse?

In a turn of events rife with irony, the current intifadah has fragmented the Palestinian Authority and weakened the supreme authority of its president, Yasser Arafat.

Given these developments, one must wonder whether Arafat would have had the temerity of launching the second uprising, now edging into its seventh month, had he been fully aware of its possible consequences.

Sheldon Kirshner in Toronto

The intifadah has disrupted the ebb and flow of normal life in the West Bank and the Gaza Strip – curtailing social and educational services, halting development projects, paralyzing local industries, cutting off trade with Israel, depriving 1250,000 workers of a livelihood in Israel and deepening the abysmal level of poverty and misery.

As a result, the Palestinian economy hovers on the brink of insolvency and collapse, according to Martin Indyk, the United States ambassador to Israel.

The other unintended effect of the uprising is that it has diluted Arafat's standing – yet to what degree is difficult to ascertain. Amost certainly, Arafat is no longer in complete charge, as Egypt's president, Hosni Mubarak, suggested on April 1.

Maj.-Gen. Ya'akov Or, Israel's co-ordinator of government activities in the territories, claims that a state of semi-anarchy has enveloped the Palestinian autonomous areas. In Or's estimation, the PA has lost its grip over civilian institutions, and the vacuum has been filled by forces with their own agenda.

Arafat, who has been written off many times before in the past, remains the dominant political figure in the PA, established in 1994 under the 1993 Olso accords. But his inability to exert total control, Israeli security officials believe, has robbed him of the power to call all the shots in the PA's campaign of violence against Israeli soldiers and civilians in Israel and the territories.

If Arafat is not actually orchestrating the recent attacks, which have claimed the lives of over 70 Israelis, he has done precious little to prevent them from being carried out by armed PA groups like Fatah and Force 17 and by non-PA formations such as Hamas and Islamic Jihad.

At the very least, Arafat and his associates have incited violence by issuing inflammatory anti-Israel comments and by tolerating broadcasts and school texts that question Israel's existence and espouse and glorify armed struggle.

Gen. Amos Malka, head of Israeli military intelligence, has accused the PA of tacitly encouraging the present wave of terrorism engulfing Israel and the territories. Gen. Shaul Mofaz, the chief of staff, has taken this accusation one step further by noting that the PA is morphing into a "terror entity" by virtue of its cooperation with Hamas and Islamic Jihad in conceiving and planning terrorist operations. He claims that PA security forces, under Arafat's direction, have been responsible for 40 percent of Israeli fatalities since the eruption of the intifadah.

Emboldened by their low-grade war of attrition in the terrritories, Palestinian gunmen have begun to fire on settlements in Israel adjacent to Gaza.

Prime Minister Ariel Sharon, who was elected on a mandate to restore security, has blamed Arafat for the wave of violence, branded him as a terrorist and condemned the PA as a " terrorist body."

By way of responding to the terror, Sharon has adopted previously used but not necessarily successful methods: the imposition of external and internal closures on Palestinian towns, the withholding of custom duties and payroll taxes to the tune so far of $65 million, and the deployment of helicopter gunships to bomb PA offices and bases and to assassinate Palestinian militants.

Last week, Israel rocketed PA facilities and Arafat's house, and then killed an Islamic Jihad leader, in the first of a series of pinprick assaults aimed at Palestinians in the West Bank and Gaza directly involved in terrorism.

Sharon's policy, designed to forestall the PA from achieving political gains through violence, has had a devastating impact on the PA's economy.

The closures, originally introduced by Yitzhak Rabin in 1993 to squelch a previous outbreak of terrorism, have cut the West Bank and Gaza into isolated enclaves and brought the economy to a virtual standstill.

Since the autumn, the PA's gross national product and per capita annual income have fallen, while the unemployment rate has skyrocketed. By all accounts, the PA has lost upwards of $2 billion in income, some of it due to the closing of the Oasis Casino, shelled and damaged by Israel last November.

On March 29, Israel inflicted yet another blow to the PA's shaky economy, shutting down the Erez industrial zone on the border with Gaza and throwing 4,000 Palestinian workers out of jobs. The calamitous situation in the autonomous Palestinian areas is such that the PA has had trouble meeeting the payroll for 130,000 employees.

The parlous state of its economy, as well as the punishing closures, have forced banks to slap a ban on credit, rendered tax collection virtually impossible, halted the construction of a port in Gaza and a sewage system in Nablus, closed food and textile plants and markets near the Green Line frequented by Israelis, and destroyed the embryonic tourist industry.

Cognizant of these disasters, the recent Arab summit in Amman extended a helping hand, pledging to lend the PA $40 million per month for the next six months. Arab leaders, however, were conspicuously silent about the $1 billion in aid they promised the PA last November. Concerned by recurrent reports of corruption and mismanagement swirling around the PA, the Arab League has disbursed only a fraction of that amount. (By contrast, Iraq, struggling to establish a link between the Arab-Israeli dispute and the crisis in the Persian Gulf, has chanelled funds directly to Palestinian victims of the intifadah rather than to the PA).

Without a doubt, Israel's blockade of the West Bank and Gaza has embittered the Palestinians and reinforced rejectionist attitudes. As Terje Larsen, the United Nations' special envoy to the region, recently put it: "Hunger breeds hatred, hatred breeds violence, and violence breeds extremism."

Clearly, Israel's siege and occupation of the territories are radicalizing Palestinian public opinion, strengthening Islamic fundamentalism and marginalizing pragmatic Palestinians ready to coexist with Israel.

At the same time, Israelis of all political stripes have grown increasingly wary of and disillusioned with Arafat, who rejected Ehud Barak's unprecedented concessions at last July's Camp David summit, who failed to present a counter offer, and who still insists that a permanent agreement must include the return of Palestinian refugees to their former homes in what is now Israel.

The Israeli backlash against Arafat in particular and the PA in general is so widespread that Meretz party leader Yossi Sarid, a champion of Palestinian statehood, has warned Arafat that he will pay dearly for encouraging terrorism. "You are playing with fire," he said in a tough message last month. "You must understand that the negotiating table is the only place to resolve conflict."

Yossi Sarid

The resolution of the conflict does not depend on the Palestinians alone. Is Sharon, a hawk by inclination, prepared to conclude a final status settlement with the Palestinians? Not really. He prefers interim arrangements, which Arafat rejects, and he has publicly stated that he is in no mood to relinquish more land than has already been alloted to the PA.

If impressions count, Sharon believes that military measures can break the back of the intifadah, which Arafat has repeatedly vowed to continue. On this matter, Shimon Peres, the foreign minister, differs. As he observed recently, "You can't put out fire with fire."

Be that as it may, Israel has resigned itself to a lengthy rebellion. It will be recalled that the first intifadah lasted for almost six years.

Last week, the scope of the uprising widened ominously when Israeli commandos penetrated Area A, controlled by the PA, and arrested five members of Force 17.

It is debatable whether Arafat can call off the intifadah with a magic wand when some of his closest colleagues are opposed to its cessation until basic Palestinian demands are met.

In the meantime, as hopes for a peaceful resolution of Israel's conflict with the Palestinians dim, the PA appears to be crumbling. This leaves Israeli decision-makers with the awesome responsibility of deciding whether they should let it wither away and die.

The dissolution of the PA would not be in Israel's best interests. Its collapse would bring greater anarchy to the territories, create a dangerous vacuum that radicals would exploit, and spell finis to the promise of peace.

CJC Plenary panel set to examine media's coverage of Jewish issues

TORONTO — Canadian Jewish Congress (CJC) has announced that Tom Rose, publisher and CEO of the Jerusalem Post, will join a panel of Canadian columnists to look at how and why Jewish issues are reported in the media at the upcoming CJC plenary assembly to be held at Inn on the Park in Toronto on May 6 and 7.

From Israel to Holocaust restitution, Jewish issues are featured in newspapers across the country. To what interests are editors and writers responding when these stories are covered and printed?

Why do statements made by Yves Michaud in Quebec or Ian Lumsden, the Beaverbrook Art Gallery director in Fredericton, N.B., get such wide coverage and interest? Why do even small-town newspapers in Canada place such an emphasis on events in Israel? Why was there so much incessant coverage of the violence in Israel at the beginning of the intifadah (almost 24 hours on CNN) and such little coverage now? Is it true that there is a difference in coverage of Israel by the electronic versus the print media, and why?

These are some of the questions the panellists will be asked to address in what promises to be a dynamic exchange of views that is both informative and entertaining.

Thomas Rose has headed the Jerusalem Post since 1998. He has multiplied its readership twentyfold and made it into the world's first newspaper to establish its own all-news English-language Internet radio station: www.jpostradio.com, the leading source of information on Israel news. Rose also regularly comments on events in Israel and the Middle East for the Weekly Standard magazine and the Chicago Sun-Times. He appears frequently on television and radio in North America and Israel.

Isabel Vincent is a National Post columnist, and as author of Hitler's Silent Partners: Swiss Banks, Nazi Gold and the Pursuit of Justice, has written extensively on issues of major concern to the Jewish community.

Marcus Gee is a Globe and Mail columnist and editorial writer on international and Middle East affairs, widely praised in the Jewish community for his recent articles highlighting the responsibility of Arafat and the Palestinian Authority for fomenting the current crisis.

Michel Auger is a political columnist who appears as a commentator on French and English national television and whose columns appear regularly in the Toronto Sun in English and in the Journal de Montréal in French.

Mordechai Ben Dat is the editor of The Canadian Jewish News, Canada's largest English-language Jewish newspaper. Ben-Dat has a unique view of the role of the Jewish newspaper, both as a record of Jewish history and as an instrument for creating a sense of peoplehood.

JWI's Woman of the Year is a community activist

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Wanda MacNevin, community activist and author will be presented with the Woman of the Year award by Jewish Women International of Toronto at its Woman of the Year luncheon on April 29.

Author of the self-published book, From the Edge: A Women's Evolution from Abuse to Activism, MacNevin is being honoured for her work in the Jane-Finch community.

Greta Miller, Woman of the Year chair, said the committee chose MacNevin, "because of what she has made of her life. She came out of an abusive situation and became a pillar in her community. She has made the Jane Finch community a caring place."

MacNevin, 51, originally from Prince Edward Island, moved to Toronto as a young child, and was married at 18 to a man who became abusive on their wedding night. She wanted to leave the marriage for a long time "but I was afraid to leave. Abuse paralyzes women."

After a savage beating for which her husband spent two years in jail – he is now serving 23 years for another offence – she says she knew she had to get out of the marriage.

She moved into an apartment in the Jane-Finch community with her two children – she eventually had a third – "and it was the best thing that happened to me. I met some wonderful people and organizations in that building."

She became involved in the Jane Finch Community and Family Centre, she said, when a social worker "noticed I might have something to offer."

MacNevin, a grandmother of three, volunteered at the centre until a job opening came up in the child-parent program. She eventually moved on to become a program worker and then a child/parent co-ordinator.

She is now a community health worker at the Black Creek Community Health Centre where she has received funding for, and co-ordinates such programs as a teen mother support group, a teen violence prevention project and the Yorkwoods Safe Neighbourhood Project.

"In our neighbourhood many youth feel lost and alone, and a lot of girls end up getting pregnant. It is not our job to judge [the girls]; we have to try and help by giving them something constructive to do.

"One way the teens have helped is by developing skits that they have performed for other teens, and by producing a video about their own stories. These girls feel good about what they have contributed."

The premise she operates under, she said, "is that we have to believe in the capacity of people. Too often, we focus on their problems and miss the contributions they could be making.

Wanda MacNevin

"We can find out what people have to offer, she said, by taking the time to get to know them, by building relationships. In my case it was a social worker who invited me to a meeting. It changed my life."

After 25 years of working in the community, MacNevin said, "I feel confident in my skills and I feel lucky. I only went to school until Grade 11 and so I learned from the people I worked with. I was like a sponge."

Her book, which she began writing in the early '90s, "has been a long process. In it, I tell my story, and I talk about the spirit of the community.

"I eventually published 1,000 copies – to date I have sold 690 – which will not be in the bookstores because I do not want any profits going to the private sector. Proceeds are going to the Jane-Finch Community and Family Centre."

When people get involved in a community, said MacNevin, their self-esteem goes up, "whether they have been in an abusive situation, or if they feel isolated. All it takes is one phone call to an organization.

"I realize that people need a sense of self-confidence to make that initial call, and that is why it is important to have outreach workers in the community – to help them along the way."

MacNevin remarried in 1999 – "to a man who has a long history of community activism" – and has bought a house within the Jane Finch community. "We looked elsewhere, but ended up living here. It is where we are comfortable."

For information on MacNevin's book, call the Jane Finch Community and Family Centre at 416-663-2733 or write Picas and Points Publishing, Downsview P.O., P.O. Box 38, Downsview, Ontario M3M 3A3.

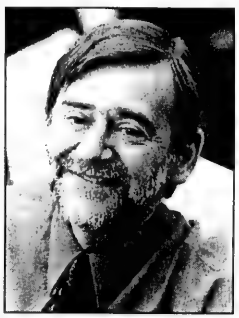
Freiman takes over as deputy attorney general

By RON CSILLAG
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — The top two job-holders at the office of the Ontario attorney general are Jewish.

In February, David Young, the MPP for Willowdale, was appointed attorney general, following in the footsteps of Charles Harnick, who held the post in the first Mike Harris government.

But as government watchers know, much of the power behind the minister in any department is the deputy minister, and in this case, it's Mark Freiman.



Mark Freiman

As Ontario's deputy attorney general, Freiman is the top bureaucrat in the AG's office, helping execute government policies. At the same time, he's in charge of a huge department that enforces hundreds of laws and statutes, and oversees the province's court system, with its 600 or so Crown attorneys.

It's a far cry from his job as an erstwhile English professor.

But Freiman is best known to the Jewish community in neither of those capacities. Rather, he made his mark as lead counsel to the Canadian Human Rights Commission in the matter of a hate-filled Internet site purportedly run and financed by pro-Nazi publisher Ernst Zundel.

Freiman can't stress enough that his work on the Zundel file is separate from his job as deputy attorney general, and that in pronouncing on it, he's not reflecting government policy. His involvement in the Zundel case preceded his government appointment, which was announced in late January, and he was cleared by a conflict of interest counsellor to carry on with the file.

The case began more than four years ago, when local Holocaust survivor Sabina Citron brought a complaint against the so-called Zundelsite, arguing it exposed Jews to hatred and contempt in violation of federal human rights codes. Citron was later joined by the Toronto Mayor's committee on community and race relations, with several Jewish groups participating as interveners.

Adding to the often strange twists and turns in the case – including potentially damaging evidence from Zundel's ex-wife – was news that Zundel had pulled up his longtime Toronto stakes and relocated with a new wife, supposedly to Tennessee.

The case finally wound up in February. Freiman says the remaining panel members will deliberate for the next few months. He calls the overlap between his first government appointment in July 1999 and his position as counsel to the commission "what I did on my summer vacation." He's only half-joking; he did use personal vacation time to wrap up the Zundel case.

Freiman is hopeful the commission will issue a cease and desist order against Zundel.

"That would make it impossible for anyone wanting to engage in this sort of activity to enjoy living in Canada," he says. "It would send a strong symbolic and educational message."

And if Zundel ignores the commission's order to stop funding, editing and contributing to the site, he would be charged with contempt if he ever returned to Canada. "If he disobeys, he could be subject to criminal prosecution," Freiman observes. "It's unlikely he can be extradited [from the United States], but he could never return."

Freiman knows well that Internet-based hatred is a big priority for the Jewish community, but he cannot divulge or even discuss government policy. "You can never shut down all hate sites," he says. Besides, it's the federal government, not Ontario, that has jurisdiction over telecommunications, he adds, stressing, again, that he's speaking in a private capacity.

But a victory for Freiman in the Zundel case would be especially sweet. He was born in Vienna in 1947 to Polish refugee parents who survived the war in hiding. Both were the only survivors of their families.

They came to Canada in 1952, and Freiman graduated from the first graduating class of what became Community Hebrew Academy of Toronto.

After studying English language and literature at the University of Toronto, he earned a PhD in modern thought and literature from Stanford University in California, focusing on the work of American naturalist writer and poet Stephen Crane.

That led to a teaching job at Trinity College in Hartford, Conn., and then back to U of T, where he taught English literature and popular culture.

"The more I taught pop culture, the more I delved into broadcast regulations. The more I did that, the more I realized I needed to understand the laws surrounding those regulations." So it was back to school, learning the law in the morning, and teaching in the afternoons.

He graduated in 1983 and clerked for Brian Dixon, a former chief justice of Canada's Supreme Court. In 1985, he joined the firm of McCarthy Tetrault, where he stayed until 1999, when he took a leave of absence to join the government as assistant deputy attorney general. He was named acting deputy minister a year later.

He's married to Kate Miriam Freiman, a writer of women's fiction (a genre once called romance). They have one son, Ben.

Asked what Jewish values he brings to his job, Freiman doesn't hesitate. "Tikkun olam (repair of the world). It's a general imperative for all Jews, and I also understand it as the pursuit of justice."

NCJW launches Think Pink! campaign

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — The National Council of Jewish Women Toronto section has developed the Lilac Project as the new fund-raising arm for its various charitable activities.

In the 2001 campaign, titled Think Pink!, NCJW has earmarked proceeds to go towards breast cancer research at Princess Margaret Hospital.

The purpose of the Lilac Project (Living is Learning and Caring), said Terry Winston, executive director of NCJW Toronto section, is to have a more directed fund-raising process. "In coming years, campaigns will be directed towards such areas as the food drive or elder abuse programs."

They chose Princess Margaret as its first partner in the new year-long campaign, she said, "because we wanted to be affiliated with a prominent organization that is leading a number of international research efforts integrating research into the prevention, causes and development of breast cancer with quality patient care."

The campaign, which took two years to develop, includes raising money through cause related marketing – proceeds of selected goods and services will go towards the campaign – presenting education forums, and handing out information on breast self-examination.

Its initial event was an evening with Dr. Jerri Nielsen, a doctor who discovered and treated her own breast cancer while working at the South Pole.

"The idea is that we think about breast cancer all year long and make breast self-examination part of our monthly health check. Education is one of our primary mandates," Winston said.

In the long range, said Sheila Mostyn, president NCJW Toronto section, the organization will change its focus in order to answer various needs.

"We're very excited about the Think Pink! campaign," Winston said. "It has opened the door [to many opportunities] and enables us to make a difference.

"With money raised we can provide funding for research, as well as raise public awareness. Breast cancer touches many people, and the scope of our campaign has to match the scope of how the disease touches people," Winston said.

Involved in the cause-related marketing, she said, are Mark Anthony Salons, whose products are carried in salons. "He is also challenging other salons to a cut-a-thon, and is offering a free makeover to a breast cancer survivor," she said.

As well, the Distillers Association and the Ontario Restaurant, Hotel and Motel Association have developed a pink cocktail which will be offered for sale in various hotels and restaurants. Cards on each table will explain that a portion of the drinks' proceeds will go towards the Think Pink! campaign.

A two-pound pareve chocolate brownie made by Cakes to Your Door.com, "will be delivered to your house for $22.95, 40 percent of which will go towards our campaign," said Winston.

Cases of brownies can also be ordered on the Think Pink! Web site, Think Pink Canada.com, she said.

"This Web site opens the door for inquiries from around the world. Wherever there is a need, we will answer it," said Winston.

Chair of the Think Pink! campaign is Toronto Mayor Mel Lastman. Official spokesperson is television personality Carla Collins.

Ten commandments of modern Orthodoxy

By MOSHE KAVEH

The Passover season compels Jews to do more than remember our deliverance from the pharaoh of Egypt. We must also ask God's help and do our part to gain freedom from modern pharaohs of the mind, heart and spirit. I believe this is especially important for the modern Orthodox community, of which I am a part.

As a bridge between modernity and tradition, the modern Orthodox have a special role to play in battling the pharaoh of intolerance, the pharaoh of ignorance, and the pharaoh of Jewish disunity. Our sages teach that Jewish unity – the Jews of Egypt remained united in their language, dress and culture – was the key to Jewish redemption.

While many Orthodox Jews these days are discussing what must be done to make tradition more relevant, I believe the more important challenge is to make tradition more valuable, more directly beneficial to individual Jews in their daily lives, as well as to the larger social order.

Modern Orthodoxy should take up this challenge. We must demonstrate with our own conduct and teachings that Halachah, Jewish law, has the potential to liberate Jews everywhere from our internal pharaohs. Here then, are ten challenges, or commandments, for modern Orthodoxy:

• Emphasize human relations. Modern Orthodoxy should vigorously espouse renewed devotion to the commandments governing human relations. Unfortunately, religious pride and self-confidence, themselves worthy and necessary values, often lead to condescension and arrogance. We need to teach, in an organized fashion and as a Torah priority, the centrality of humility ("Walk humbly before your God"), and the importance of love, respect, honour and peace – what the sages called ahavat habriot, or love for all creation.

• Teach Judaism and democracy together. Judaism and democracy are complementary, not contradictory, value systems. Jewish law obligates us to support a Jewish and democratic State of Israel, and a knowledgeable modern Orthodox, Torah Jew should be able to demonstrate this from biblical and Talmudic sources. We must teach this principle in all schools, religious and secular.

• Promote the "community of Israel," klal Yisrael, as a religious concept. Preserving the community of Israel supersedes all other values in our tradition, including the sanctity of life, and it certainly outweighs the winning of most organizational battles. At the very least, the importance of unity demands that we restrain our ideological passions and denominational dreams when these irreconcilably conflict with those of other committed Jews, including the Reform and Conservative.

• Establish new religious parameters on relating to the secular. Because tradition casts non-observance as an aberration, there are no formal halachic guidelines for relations with secular Jews. Today, however, secularism is an entrenched way of life. Observant Judaism cannot ignore this fact, and must find a way to halachically incorporate secular Jewish commitment within klal Yisrael. Non-observers can no longer be dismissed as lost Jews.

• Pursue socio-economic justice. Concern for the orphan and widow, the quest for justice and human rights, and the eradication of corruption and economic exploitation must be religious priorities. Our community cannot be silent about the growing, frightening income gap between rich and poor in Israel and North America, on the mistreatment of foreign workers, or other forms of injustice.

• Recommit to Zionism. For decades, modern Orthodoxy was synonymous with religious Zionism and was a great producer of olim. But even the modern Orthodox public increasingly is becoming "post-Zionist" and unmistakably materialistic. I say revamp educational curricula to re-ignite the spirit and values of classical Zionism, including aliyah, and to re-accentuate the centrality of the State of Israel.

• Confront science and culture. Despite the fact that our youth become doctors and accountants and go to movies, our schools have not yet confronted the ideological challenges that astronomy, physics, art, philosophy and modern sexual permissiveness pose to traditional dogma. Modern Orthodox youth have to be formally schooled in understanding the ideological choices they confront.

• Modernize the study of Jewish law, especially Talmud. Make Talmud study exciting and relevant using state-of-the-art teaching methodologies and reference to modern-day legal problems and precedents. Adopt strategies that teach Talmudic issues, not merely pages of Talmud. The sad truth is that Talmud is the most unpopular subject in many Orthodox schools.

• Advance the status of women. Great social change in the status of women is already underway within Orthodoxy. We must continue to develop Torah-study opportunities for women, support the assumption by women of leadership in rabbinical courts and in family law areas, and push harder to resolve problems faced by women in Judaism, such as the plight of agunot.

• Produce more broadly educated rabbis. Modern Orthodoxy is as good as its rabbis. None of the above developments will be possible without rabbis who possess the halachic erudition and the broad, worldly knowledge necessary to make religious law intellectually powerful and emotionally appealing. Can we produce such leaders?

Halachah is traditionally thought of as a "yoke" that observant Jews gladly accept. This Passover, it is time to start showing how Halachah can also help to set the Jewish people free.

Mutz presents Toby Feldberg, President, Beit Halochem Canada with an Appreciation Award.

THE STORY OF A HERO

Mutz Matalon, a paratrooper in the West Bank, was sent on a mission in the Golan Heights. The truck he was riding in flipped over, and Mutz was gravely injured. At just 19 years of age, he faced the harsh reality of spending the rest of his life in a wheelchair as a paraplegic.

Mutz spent several years in intensive therapy at Beit Halochem, Tel Aviv and his journey to recovery is nothing less than heroic. He excelled in javelin and shotput. In 1975 Mutz travelled to England to participate in the World Events for the Handicapped and in 1976, he represented Israel at the Paralympics in Toronto.

Mutz has devoted his life assisting disabled veterans to become productive members of society. Elected as Head of the Herzliya City Council Welfare Department, he has successfully lobbied on behalf of the disabled for job placement and residential arrangements.

Mutz's journey has been a difficult one. The camaraderie and support he experienced at Beit Halochem is the source of his inspiration today. As National Chairman of Zahal Disabled Veterans Organization, Beit Halochem Israel, Mutz continues to fight for the rights of disabled veterans who are recuperating from their life-shattering experience.

Beit Halochem is filling a vital need in a country which has more than its share of paraplegics. With your support, Beit Halochem is there to help. Please ... give generously.

Jewish teacher program awarded $150,000 grant

TORONTO — York University's Jewish Teacher Education Program in partnership with the Toronto Board of Jewish Education has been awarded a grant to establish a 'virtual' professional development centre for Jewish day school teachers across Canada.

York Prof. Alex Pomson, co-co-ordinator of the Jewish Teacher Education Program said the $150,000 grant by the L.A. Pincus Jewish Education Fund for the Diaspora will provide a unique opportunity to explore the effectiveness of the Internet in helping to meet the professional needs of teachers.

The grant will go towards developing three online courses during the two-year pilot phase of the project – Serving Special Needs Students in the Jewish Studies Classroom; Jewish Early Childhood Education; and Teaching Bible.

"This deepens the capacity of the Jewish Teacher Program to serve a national community of Jewish educators," said Pomson, who is also Koschitzky Professor of Jewish Education at York.

"Internet technology enables us to bridge the distances which make the professional enhancement of Jewish education so difficult in smaller communities. The project further diversifies our long-standing partnership with the Toronto Board of Jewish Education, our collaborators in this initiative."

Seymour Epstein, Director, UJA FEDERATION Board of Jewish Education, said the initiative will mark a turning point in efforts to enhance teaching and learning in Jewish schools.

"In the 21st century, the ability for teachers to grow at their own pace will be significantly advanced by the use of computer-based in-service training."

Since its first allocations in March 1977, the L.A. Pincus Fund has financially assisted more than 300 educational projects – totalling almost $38 million – in some 40 countries throughout the world. Projects have covered a wide spectrum of activities aimed at strengthening Jewish education in the Diaspora.

The founding partners which provided the fund's capital are the Jewish Agency for Israel, the World Zionist Organization, the American Jewish Joint Distribution Committee and the government of Israel.

York has the only Jewish teacher education program in Canada whose graduates are certified to teach both Jewish and general education studies. York's Jewish Teacher Education Program is a partnership between the Faculty of Education, the Centre for Jewish Studies and the Faculty of Arts, with the co-operation of the Toronto Board of Jewish Education.

Jewish Life

Ageless, Jewish way of life

Exploring Jewish Tradition – A Transliterated Guide to Everyday Practice and Observance*, by Rabbi Abraham B. Witty and Rachel J. Witty, Random House, $44.95

At first blush, this handsomely produced volume seems like many other introductory guidebooks to Judaism. But further examination reveals that Exploring Jewish Tradition is far more ambitious and successful than most. In 10 authoritative, but reader friendly chapters, the husband and wife team lead the reader step by step through the vocabulary, liturgy, life cycle and varied customs and observances of Jewish life.

Books
Bernard Baskin

The approach of the authors is undeviatingly Orthodox, and in the book's 540 pages there is no reference made to other forms of Judaism.

Under the heading What is Torah? the authors present a concise but thoughtful definition. "Judaism is more than a faith. It encompasses religious laws; sacred rituals and age-old customs; thousands of years of uninterrupted history; a spiritual, physical and political attachment to the Jewish homeland; a commitment to social justice and righteousness; a deep love of learning; a dedication to the perpetuation of the Hebrew language; and varied cultural expression in art, music, dance and the theatre."

It is impossible in a brief review to indicate more than disparate and incidental bits of information from the book. Here are some examples:

After the granting of a get, the husband may remarry immediately. The wife must wait 92 days, in order to determine that she was not pregnant at the time of the divorce, and to assure the paternity of any children born after her remarriage.

When a husband refuses to give his wife a get, she is called an agunah, an abandoned wife. This term also applies to a wife whose husband is missing – such as during war – and she cannot provide proof of his death. Such a woman is considered "chained." The tragic situation of the agunah seeks remedy and resolution within Jewish law – thus far without success.

In days gone by, the shadchan, the professional matchmaker, was engaged in a necessary and honourable profession. By the 12th century, as countless pogroms and persecutions forced Jews to flee, the function of the shadchan had become a matter of Jewish survival. The shadchan journeyed from shtetl to shtetl, sometimes risking danger in the little towns of Europe.

By the end of the 16th century, there was a general shift in attitude. Those who practised it became the object of humorous and insulting jibes.

Because a jealous glance was thought to bring evil, the expression b'li ayin hara, without an evil eye, was uttered whenever a complimentary remark was said.

Some people even resorted to wearing amulets to ward off the ayin hara. Called k'miot, these amulets were thought to have curative powers and were intended to protect the wearer from evil spirits and illness. Most rabbinic authorities opposed the use of all k'miot.

A strange and seldom practised ritual involves remedying a "bad dream." According to the Talmud, the troubled dreamer can choose three close friends to help him transform the dream from evil to good. In the ritual, the dreamer seven times intones the words, "I have seen a good dream." The trio all respond, "It is good and may it become good. May the merciful One transform it to good. May heaven decree upon it seven times that it become good and always will be good."

If the dream is especially troubling, fasting is permitted even on the Sabbath or on a festival.

This volume distils much of the age-old Jewish way of life in a lucid and thoughtful fashion. Who cannot learn from it?

Children make us whole

By ELLIOTT MALAMET

Have you ever been speaking to someone and you can see in their eyes that they're just waiting for you to finish talking so that they can get on with their point? Or somebody who, no matter what you tell them, replies "I know that?" That person is the wicked child of the Haggadah's "four sons."

JEWISH EDUCATION
The Next Generation

And yet I'm left with a distinct feeling that the dichotomies of the Haggadah – who is wise and who is wicked – don't quite apply in the same way anymore. For one thing, the wicked son has shown up at the table, and he's involved enough to be asking a question. One of the great mistakes in education is to interpret skeptical encounter as a disaster. Engagement is never a disaster. And when we transmit to people that we've given up on them, that's the cue they use to give up on their own spiritual life.

When the first chief rabbi of Palestine, Rabbi Abraham Isaac Kook, was asked how he could feel so connected to the secular Jews who violated much of the Torah law that he held so dear, he replied, "Better that I err in engaging in groundless love than in groundless hatred."

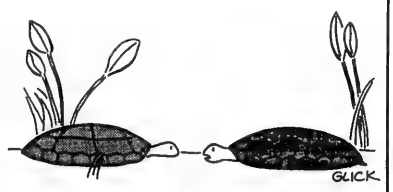
The same is true of the "the child who doesn't even know how to ask." The myth about this child is that he is "ignorant." But since when did lack of knowledge translate into muteness? Were I to attend a Zulu tribal ritual, I'd be filled with questions. What is more likely is that this child is embarrassed or angry. How did that last child become ashamed or just stunned into silence? From years of having been told that his or her opinions and questions did not have value, were hardly worth uttering.

Commentators on the Haggadah have speculated that the four children are really one child, a composite of all the various parts in a person. One of the goals of life is to weave the multiple fragments of the self into a unifying wholeness. We make our children whole in transmitting to them the infinite value of their questions.

But perhaps on the deepest level, however, it is our children who make us whole. Rabbi Shlomo Carlebach, in discussing yachatz (the seder ritual of breaking the middle matzah into two pieces), quotes the Koznitzer Maggid: "The world is so broken, but our children can make it whole again. We break the matzah; the small piece we keep, and the big piece – the bigger brokenness – our children take away. Then they bring it back to us whole, to serve as the afikoman at the end of the seder. Our children are taking brokenness away from us."

The Gemara in Ta'anit quotes the words of Rebbe Chanina, who makes the now well-known comment, "I have learned much from my teachers, and from my colleagues more than from my teachers, but from my students more than from them all." This is not just a nice sentiment. It isn't because younger people are inherently wiser or because one's teachers have little to say. It is because when one is forced to tell Torah over to others, to listen to their questions – fundamental inquiries, challenges, perplexities and even anguished rejections – that is when one learns the most.

SHMOOZIN



"After all the Passover preparations, I'm moving even slower than usual!"

Jewish Life

Sefirat HaOmer

By MARK MIETKIEWICZ

It's somewhat ironic that on the second night of Pesach, with the holiday barely under way, Jews are already beginning to prepare themselves for yet another festival. Sunday night marked day one of sefirat HaOmer, the counting of the Omer, which culminates seven weeks later with Shavuot. This period is a fascinating one, long associated with spiritual, even kabbalistic growth.

Just what is the "Omer?" According to the Torah, an offering consisting of an "omer" (a specific measure) of barley was brought to the Temple on the second day of Passover [207.168.91.4/vjholidays/lagbaomer/omer.htm]. Until that offering was made, no grain from the new year's crop was to be eaten. From that day on, it was necessary to count 49 days until Shavuot – the Feast of the Wheat Harvest (Leviticus 23:15) [bible.ort.org/books/torahd5.asp?action=displaypage&book=3&chapter=23&verse=15&portion=31].

After the destruction of the Temple, the practice of bringing barley was discontinued, but Jews continued to count the omer period.

The Ohr Somayach site calls this period a spiritual journey of 49 Steps [www.ohr.org.il/special/omer/index.htm]. The Kabbalists' interpretation of the Omer was based on the various permutations (seven times seven) of the sefirot or mystical emanations. These sefirot denote the ascent from the 49 "gates" of impurity of the Egyptian bondage to the purity of the revelation at Sinai. Each day and week is given its own mystical attribute such as chesed (loving kindness), gevurah (restraint) and tiferes (beauty). You can read essays on the various permutations and how each of the 49 days has its own unique quality [www.havienu.org/html/Praying/Omer].

The Omer season has also been associated with many national tragedies; so it has become the custom to refrain from holding public celebrations during this period. Eliezer Segal looks at the various tragic events that have occurred during Sefirat HaOmer and looks at related prohibitions such as wearing new clothes and getting married [www.acs.ucalgary.ca/~elsegal/Shokel/Calendar_Index.html#Omer].

How do you keep your days straight throughout the 49 days of counting? Download a program to keep track of time for you. You can refer to the daily chart at the Orthodox Union site [www.ou.org/chagim/sefira/datechart.htm] or you can create a personalized calendar with the Omer count at the Havienu L'Shalom site [www.havienu.org/html/Living/calendars.html]. Mac users can even download Doron Shalmon's MacSefira shareware program [www.ohavemeth.org/MacSefira/].

And in a case of old meets new, there is The Homer Calendar [www.jvibe.com/homer/]. Keeping track of the daily count can be confusing but if H'Omer Simpson can do it, so can you. There are articles about the reasons for counting the Omer, appropriate charts and illustrations of Homer and Bart. (Bonus: There's even a slide show about the Jewish denizens of Springfield.)

And if you still are worried about missing a day, you can register to have an e-mail reminder sent to you daily by Project Genesis [www.torah.org/learning/yomtov/omer/sefira.html#subscribe]. Just don't forget to turn on your computer.

Of course you may not be near your computer when night falls. But you can always count on your Palm Pilot [www.penticon.com/products/omer.html]. The Palm's free Omer program automatically displays the correct information for each day and can track the days that you have already counted. You can even set an alarm to automatically remind you daily. That way, you'll never forget about the Omer even when you're out for the count.

Yizkor allows us to shed holy tears

By RABBI LEIGH LERNER

The salt water of the seder plate returns to us on this conclusion of Pesach, not in the tears our ancestors shed, but in our own tears, as we remember with Yizkor those who have died. Yizkor gives us permission to shed tears of loss.

Tears were not invented in Egyptian slavery. Adam and Eve wept the first tears, and a legend explains that after they were banished from the Garden of Eden, God saw their penitence and sympathized.

God said, "You have been driven from the Garden, where you lived without care. Now you have entered a world of sorrow and trouble. Know, however, that My benevolence and My love for you will never end. Your tribulation may embitter your lives. For this reason, I give you a treasure, this priceless pearl, a tear. When grief overtakes you and your heart aches, then this pearl, this small tear will fall from your eyes. It will lighten your burden."

When Adam and Eve heard these words, sorrow overcame them. Tears welled up in their eyes, rolled down their cheeks and fell to the ground. Since then, whenever a human being's heart aches and his spirit is oppressed, the tears flow, and the gloom may be lifted.

In some instances, tears have the same function as prayer. When Hannah prayed for a child, nothing happened, but when she both prayed and wept because of her childlessness, God responded by giving her the child Samuel.

This is a reminder of a talmudic dictum. Rabbi Elazar said: "From the day the Temple was destroyed, the gates of prayer have been closed,[as it says, 'And when I shout and plead, He shuts out my prayer.' (Lamentations 3:8)] But even though the gates of prayer are closed, the gates of tears are opened, as it says, 'Hear my prayer, O Lord, give ear to my appeal; do not disregard my tears'" (Psalms 39:13). (Babylonian Talmud 32b)

As we think of those who shed their tears for us, and of those for whom we have shed our tears, let us consider those tears to be holy, each tear a prayer in and of itself.

The salt water of the seder plate goes hand in hand with the parsley. In our mind's eye, let us bring the springtime symbol of parsley to the salt water. Let us bring the hope of growth and renewal to the moment when our tears flow. Let us tell ourselves that, just as the days grow lighter in springtime, we not only hope that tears will lighten the burden, but we also pray that, like the plant world around us, we too may grow toward new light.

There is no true growth without tears, and there is no truer prayer than the drop of salt water that the eye sheds in sorrow or pain. May the gates of prayer open for us through our tears on the morning of Yizkor.

The lowdown on lasers: 'spectacular' results

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — It may sound like hyperbole, but when Dr. Jeffrey Dover says that laser skin treatments can change people's lives, he has the stories and pictures to back his claim.

The Boston area dermatologist who grew up in Ottawa, spoke on Lasers: Revolutionizing the Treatment of Skin Diseases and the Aging Face at a Weizmann Women & Science program held at the home of Dorothy Shoichet.

The program was the last of three laser-and-medicine themed talks for the 2000-2001 year, coinciding with this year's fund-raising by the Canadian Society for the Weizmann Institute of Science, which is centred around lasers.

As recently as the 1980s, some of the commonly used laser treatments that Dover discussed were not available. Although their use dates back to the 1960s, it wasn't until the 1980s that the technology improved, and not until the late '80s through the mid-'90s that it was refined to further minimize damage such as bruising to surrounding tissue, said Dover, who was named one of the best cosmetic surgeons in the United States by Town & Country magazine.

> 'Procedures are very simple, almost pain-free'

Among current uses of lasers are treatments for vascular lesions ("things that are red"), scars and pigmented lesions such as birthmarks and age spots, the former Harvard Medical School associate professor noted.

Treatment of small red blood vessels around the nose and on the face is done routinely, Dover said. "We couldn't treat this 15 years ago...The procedures are very simple, almost pain-free, and there's no downtime."

One pair of slides showed improvement in a facial scar. "After a few treatments it's not perfect but it's much, much better," he said. "You could cover it easily with make-up."

Dover also showed before and after shots of unsightly leg veins collapsed by laser with treatment perfected only about a year ago.

Among the doctor's favourite cases are babies with disfiguring bluish gray spots, usually on the cheek or forehead. About one percent of Asians are affected, he noted. In the 1980s, there was no effective treatment, Dover said, but now, 90 to 100 percent clear totally after six treatments.

The procedure can be done in the mother's arms, using protective goggles – "with no cuts, no scalpel, no bleeding and no anesthesia."

Likewise, bright red hemangiomas (growth of blood vessels) are "totally gone" after treatment, with no scarring – a routine procedure that wasn't possible 10 years ago, he remarked.

Similar treatment can remove tattoos and even "road tattoos," as he demonstrated with slides of a patient who'd fallen from a motorcycle and had dark "spots tattooed" into his face from contact with the road.

It's laser resurfacing, however, that "brought lasers onto the map nine years ago." The procedure uses a specially designed laser to remove a thin layer of skin, and can be used as an alternative to a facelift.

Although it can take a decade or more off a patient's appearance, laser resurfacing is not for everybody, cautioned Dover. It's for "people who don't have a lot of sagging but have lots of sun damage." There are three to four days of "feeling really crummy" and two weeks of "looking dreadful" before the "spectacular" results are apparent, he added.

Dover has even seen a lessening of the incidence of precancerous cells after resurfacing.

The newest use of lasers, photorejuvenation, uses very gentle layers of light, creating new collagen under the skin to make old skin look younger. In fact, an Israeli company has come up with a product – "not a true laser" – for this purpose, he noted.

It's important to be very cautious about choosing a doctor for laser treatments, Dover warned. "Go to your dermatologist and [ask] who's the best laser surgeon in Toronto – who would you send your wife to?"

When it comes to protecting skin from being damaged in the first place, Dover is a firm believer in protection against the sun. He advises patients to wear sunscreen – with both UVA and UVA protection and an SPF of 15 or higher – every day of the year. "It has been shown conclusively that UVA penetrates through window glass [even] on a gray day."

אלימות בבתי הספר

מחקרים של השנה האחרונה מציבים את בתי הספר בישראל כאלימים ביותר בעולם. זהו תואר מפוקפק ביותר לעם הקשה, ובקוראי את הדברים שאלתי את עצמי איפה בדיוק מדורגת ארצות חברית, שבה כזכור אחת לכמה חדשים יורה ילד בחבריו ובחבר המורים. על כן החלטתי לבדוק קצת יותר לעומק על מה מתבסס המחקר הזה. הממצאים האלה התפרסמו לפני כתשעה חדשים בידי האו"נון הבינלאומי להשוואת הישגים בחינוך. כרבע מתלמידי כיתות ח' בארץ דווחו שהיו קורבן לפגיעות פיזיות מידי בני בית ספרם. ארה"ב דורגה במקום הרביעי. שלושים ושמונה מדינות ו 5700 בתי ספר השתתפו במחקר. מה שאולי לא יפתיע את מי שהיה תלמיד בבית ספר ישראלי- רק 18% מתלמידי ישראל שנשאלו סברו שלחטוף מכות זו בעייה רצינית...

עד כאן הנתונים חיבשים. מעבר לשוק הראשוני, לא ממש צריך להתפלא. הכוחנות, האלימות, הן המילולית והן המעשית מאפיינת את כל מגזרי החברה הישראלית, מחשוק ועד הכנסת, מיצחק מרדכי ועד המשטרה. לא צריך להתפלא שילדים מפנימים את ההתנהגות הזו ומביאים אותה לבית הספר. כמו שאי אפשר להתפלא מכך שחמורים מפעילים אלימות מילולית כלפי תלמידיהם. כולם באותו סיר, הכל מחובר ומשפיע הדדית. אבל שישאר בינינו.

פינת שמחה

בחור משלנו מרים את ראשו לשמיים ומבקש מחשוכן במרומים שימלא , פעם אחת בחיים בקשה שלו: " תראה, ריבונו של עולם, אני נורא פוחד לטוס ולכן לא הייתי בישראל כבר שלושים שנה. רציתי לבקש ממך שתסלול אוטוסטראדה על האוקיאנוס, שאוכל לבקר את המשפחה בפסח." פתאום עונה לו בת קול: " בקשתך היא בלתי אפשרית. המחיר וכוח האדם הם כל כך גדולים שכדאי שתחשוב על משאלה אחרת יותר צנועה". חשב האיש וחשב ובסוף אמר: "תראה, ריבונו, אשתי שתחיה לא חייכה אלי כבר חמש עשרה שנה, וכל דבר זה ריב גדול ויכוחים נצחיים. אתה חושב שהיית יכול לסדר לי לפסח איזה שבוע של נחת וחיוכים?" השתרר שקט גדול, ואחרי איזה עשר דקות נשמעה בת קול מהשמיים: " כמה מסלולים אמרת שאתה רוצה באוטוסטראדה?..."

אין עשן בלי אש

עם התחדשות עבודת הכנסת, החליטה ועדת חבריאות להעביר חוק למניעת עישון במקומות ציבוריים, כולל בתי חולים, מולים ומסעדות. זהו חוק מאוד אמביציוזי למדינה שבה עשרים וחמישה אחוז מהאוכלוסיה מעשנים. יודעי דבר אומרים שתחוק חמוצע הוא אחד מחחמורים בעולם. השאלה הגדולה היא איך יצליחו לאכוף אותו. יש לי הרגשה שחספורט הלאומי יהיה לא איך לאכוף את החוק, אלא איך לעקוף אותו. אולי כדאי היה לחביא חוק פחות קיצוני שאפשר לצפות שיקיימו, אבל ימים יגידו, ושישאר בינינו.

בוש וישראל

הנשיא בוש הספיק להרגיז כבר את העולם החפשי. החלטתו לבטל את תמיכת אמריקה בתכנית להקטנת חשימוש בדלק כדי לחגן על הסביבה, מעוררת רעידת אדמה רצינית. אותו לא כל כך מעניינת רווחת חברווזים, חטבע והסביבה. הוא מעוניין רק ברווחת האורחים שבחרו אותו. אין לו שאיפות להיות מנחיג העולם החפשי. הוא עדיין במנטאליות של מושל טקסס, רק שטקסס היא עכשיו כל אמריקה. לגבי ישראל, מאחר ואין לו יומרות להתערב בסכסוך שמתנהל אלפי קילומטרים מטקסס, הוא לא צריך להיות דיפלומאטי. לכן הוא ראה בעראפת את מה שחוא: טרוריסט שהתחפש למנחיג רחוף שלום, קיבל פרס נובל ועכשיו הוא מסיר את התחפושת. מידי יום ויומו טורח בוש להזכיר לעראפת להפסיק את הטרור, וזה בחחלט מתאים לנו. חילופי ברק בשרון ממש ממש מתאימים לחילופי קלינטון בבוש. אבל שישאר בינינו.

Young leaders gather for UIA conference

By DIANE KOVEN
Ottawa Correspondent

OTTAWA — Connect@Ottawa, UIA Federation Canada's fourth national young leadership conference, held here recently, was its largest ever.

About 250 young Canadian Jewish community leaders, as well as a group from Israel, gathered for a weekend of education and entertainment.

Planning the conference was a year-long project by a committee who met mostly by telephone and e-mail, with only the co-chairs, Jonathan Baker and Jacquie Manchevsky, based in Ottawa.

"We had to design a conference so that the most observant person could feel comfortable," said Baker.

Most of the conference took place during Shabbat. "In terms of Halachah," said Baker, "we didn't overlook even the most minute detail."

The keynote address following Shabbat dinner was delivered by Prof. Shulamit Reinharz, the only woman to hold the rank of full professor of sociology at Brandeis University.

Her topic, Leadership, set the tone for the weekend of leadership training.

Rabbi Moshe Shur, the "Rockin Renaissance Rabbi," director of the Queens College Hillel Foundation in New York, led participants in spirited song and storytelling.

Throughout the day on Saturday, participants were able to choose from a variety of worship services and workshops. There was also an optional visit to the National Gallery of Canada.

Conference participants were able to meet political personalities and get an inside glimpse into the news behind the headlines.

Jason Moscovitz, CBC chief political correspondent, gave a lunchtime address.

This was followed by a panel presentation on political activism and advocacy with Haim Divon, Ambassador of Israel to Canada; Ezra Levant, communications director for Stockwell Day; and Rob Ritter, executive director of the Canada-Israel Committee.

At Sunday's awards luncheon, awards for outstanding leadership were presented to Heather Adelson Zipkin and Jeffrey Berkowitz of Montreal; Lori Lerner of Vancouver; Stephen Kleiman and Aviva Orenstein Kalin (who was unable to attend) of London; Megan Zybutz of Calgary; Wendy Schneider of Hamilton; and Elana Carr, Lynn Kirshin, Lesley Arbus, Leslie Erlich and Eli Rubenstein of Toronto.

"It took a lot of energy to be a participant in this conference because it was packed with activity and there was not a minute to rest. I think people walked away with a lot more than they expected," said Baker.

Manchevsky said, "People left saying that this has taken their commitment to a higher level, especially people from the smaller communities."

Jewish values constant, says rabbi

By DIANE KOVEN
Ottawa Correspondent

OTTAWA — While the structures and rituals are constantly changing and evolving with the times, the underlying values of Judaism remain the same, said Rabbi Niles Goldstein, at UIA Federations Canada's Fourth National Young Leadership Conference, Connect@ Ottawa, held here recently.

Rabbi Goldstein, founding rabbi of The New Shul, an innovative and multi-denominational congregation in Greenwich Village, N.Y., is also well known as the voice behind Ask the Rabbi on the Microsoft Network.

"Many Jews in our time have turned away from the Judaism of their parents and grandparents," he said."The goals are the same; only the means are beginning to change."

People today want active, participatory Judaism, said Rabbi Goldstein.

"Home Depot is successful because people want to get their hands dirty. It invites participation among people who go there."

Rabbi Goldstein has come up with a number of ways to attract young Jews to Judaism. The co-founder and educational director of Jewish Adventure Travel, he has led a number of Outward Bound trips.

"Jews flock to these programs in incredible numbers," he said."Jews have to experience Judaism in a way that they are receptive to; it has to affect their souls and not just their minds."

Retreat centres which create a comprehensive, total Jewish environment, are also effective, he said.

"They could last a weekend or a week, but can be powerful enough to change lives."

Although Rabbi Goldstein considered his Ask the Rabbi adventure in cyberspace to be rewarding and successful – "While you can't do a [brit milah] online, that lack of ritual itself is an enticement for many people attracted by spirituality" – he cautioned that technology presents a mixed benefit.

"The paradox of technology is that it draws people in at the same time that it distances them… It is a new pathway, but also a fairly problematic one."

On the positive side, technology is a great outreach tool. "You never have to look for extra chairs; you can reach people from all around the world; the anonymity often allows people to speak more candidly," said Rabbi Goldstein.

On the other hand, he said, "contact is not communication. It has become easy to rely on technology, but because of that, many people find themselves lonely and starved for relationships. No telephone conversation or e-mail can substitute for a face-to-face encounter," he said.

Whether the relationship is with God or with another human being, he said, it is important to get over our fears, to find new pathways and to reach out."A Judaism that is not relevant to our times and our needs will quickly become irrelevant to our times and to our lives," said Rabbi Goldstein.

He can be reached at Ask Rabbi Goldstein at www.ifaith.com and www.generationj.com.

Learning lessons of mass protest

On more than one occasion, I have used this space to explore the individual and collective responsibilities we have to the preservation and health of democratic principles in Canada.

That these responsibilities entail something larger than the periodic casting of an election ballot is a self-evident truth. A question arises, however, when we consider the flip side of the proposition. In offering our contribution to the political process, is it possible to overstep our appropriate bounds during the legitimate engagement in the exercise of democracy?

The issue is central to a development that has been brewing since the World Trade Organization meetings in Seattle a couple of years back were rocked by the massive demonstrations organized by a loose coalition of so-called anti-globalization activists.

Although the media have been seized with the 'existential' business of "l'affaire Grand Mère," you may have taken notice of the upcoming summit in Quebec City concerning the extension of NAFTA to all countries in Central and South America (with the exception of Cuba). Parallel to the organizing efforts for the summit has been a frenetic but determined effort to mobilize a colossal manifestation in opposition to the free trade agreement of the Americas.

To aid that effort, universities have rescheduled exams, certain MPs have arranged on Parliament Hill for instruction in " aggressive civil actions" and a trial protest run was undertaken at a Toronto meeting of finance ministers from the countries involved in the negotiation. In short, a campaign of huge proportions to disrupt the Quebec summit is unfolding – in no small way facilitated by those very institutions that are meant to foster and protect democracy.

Scene in Ottawa
By G.K. SIMCOE

Now, your instinctive reaction to all this is reasonable. Individuals and groups surely have the right, perhaps even the duty, to express opposition to those developments with which they disagree or which they view as a threat to important values and principles. Indeed, it is a most important responsibility.

However, when we examine the composition of the core groups co-ordinating the effort, we discover – as in Seattle – that many of them share nothing in common save an interest in undermining the credibility of the event. It is almost as if groups are wandering around looking for a vulnerable target and then coalesce into a pack once they identify a prey.

It would serve the Jewish community well to explore and understand this dynamic as it struggles to cope with the condemnation against Israel as Israel, in turn, struggles to cope with the violence unleashed by the Palestinians over the last seven months.

Ironically, many of them had previously participated in fabricating charges against others, who were convicted in the same kind of "show" trials. A powerful indictment of the Communist party, and a timely and powerful reminder of a horrific past. Filmed previously by Costa-Gavras as a feature, The Confession. Director Zuzana Justman will be in attendance.

When a promoter offers a contract to the singer and lead guitarist, if he dumps the band, the group's future is in jeopardy. With a pounding soundtrack, including hits from Deep Purple, The Hollies, King Crimson and Jethro Tull, Vulcan Junction is a vivid re-creation of a more innocent time in Israel.

10:00 pm - LENNY BRUCE: SWEAR TO TELL THE TRUTH
USA 1999 94 min.
Director: Robert B. Weide

Stand-up comedian Lenny Bruce's path to stardom was not easy: He was routinely busted for obscenity, he was a Jew who offended the Jewish establishment, and he was a heroin addict with legal troubles. USA 2000 102 min.
Director: Robert Kirk
English / Hebrew / Japanese with English subtitles

In 1942, Chiune Sugihara, the Japanese Consul-General in Kaunas, Lithuania, began issuing passports to Jews trying to flee Hitler. By the time of his recall to Berlin, he had saved the lives of thousands of refugees. This surprising and engrossing documentary unveils the life and acts of that rare figure who did what was right simply because he felt he had to. Producer Diane Estelle Vicari will be in attendance.

5:30 pm - KAPO
Israel 1999 55 min.
Directors: Dan Setton, Tor Ben Mayor
English / Hebrew, with English subtitles

At the time of the 1961 trial of Adolf Eichmann, there were forty other war crimes trials taking place simultaneously in Israel. Surprisingly, the defendants in those cases were Jews - "Kapos" - who had been installed by the Nazis to keep their religious compatriots in line and were often compelled, they claimed, to aid in their murders. A painful, hidden part of the Holocaust is sensitively handled by Israeli directors Setton and Ben Mayor.

With short films WIERZBNIK: IMPRESSIONS OF A TOWN THAT WAS (17 min.) and ECHO (14 min.)
Director David Stein (Wierzbnik: Impressions of a Town That Was) will be in attendance.

8:00 pm - THE SWEETEST SOUND
USA 2001 58 min.
Director: Alan Berliner

Obsessed with the thought that there might be more than one person with the same name as him, Alan Berliner set out to investigate. Eight hundred letters later, he found twelve namesakes from all over the globe and promptly invited them all to dinner. A witty exploration, the documentary is an inspired work from multi-talented Berliner. Director Alan Berliner will be in attendance.

9:45 pm - TOTAL LOVE (TLV)
Israel 2000 83 min.
Director: Gur Bentwich
English / Hebrew, with English subtitles

A drug that makes people fall instantly in love leads to a romantic entanglement involving three men and a woman named Renana, whom the trio want to rescue from jail. A wild, eccentric ride.

Thursday, May 3

1:00 pm - ALL MY LOVED ONES
Czech Republic 1999 94 min.
Director: Jiri Hubac
Czech with English subtitles

A sweeping drama about the Silberstein family and what happens when the Nazis take over Czechoslovakia. Inexorably, German racial laws begin to impact on the Silbersteins, particularly affecting Sam, a renowned concert violinist who wants to marry a non-Jew. Only the British effort to bring Jewish children to safety in England holds any hope for the youngest member of the family. A powerful melding of fact and fiction.

3:00 pm - WANDERINGS: POSTCARDS FROM THE DIASPORA
Canada 2001 48 min.
Director: Nikila Cole

Vancouver filmmaker Nikila Cole, and her 12-year-old daughter, commemorated the latter's bat mitzvah by searching for signs of Jewish life in the unlikeliest of places. What they found in countries such as South Korea, Jamaica and the Philippines, was moving and astounding, and constitutes a special look at Jews from distant lands. Director Nikila Cole and her daughter, Sarah, will be in attendance. Former Torontonian Howard Elias, Director of the Hong Kong Jewish Film Festival, will introduce the films.

With the short film THE LAST JEWISH TOWN (37 min.)

5:30 pm - COMEDY SHORTS (56.5 min.)
With FINBAR LEBOWITZ, ALLERD FISHBEIN'S IN LOVE, OBSESSED WITH JEWS and GEM

Neil Keller (star of Obsessed With Jews) will be in attendance.

Director: Pierre Grimblat
Stars: Benoit Magimel, Sagamore Stévenin, Jeanne Moreau
French with English subtitles

A young documentary filmmaker sets out to discover what happened to a budding young actor who disappeared nearly sixty years before, during the German occupation of France. He tracks down Lisa, who met and fell in love with the actor, while she was recuperating from tuberculosis in a sanitarium when they were young. As the filmmaker begins uncovering the mystery, his own familial past and its secrets come to light. A gorgeous, luminous tale of star-crossed lovers.

With the Oscar-nominated short film ONE DAY CROSSING (25 min.)

Winnipeg CJA campaign exceeds goal

By MYRON LOVE
Prairies Correspondent

WINNIPEG — For the second year in a row, the Combined Jewish Appeal campaign has exceeded its goal.

In 1999, the campaign took in $3.4 million, four percent over the target and almost $400,000 more than the year before.

In 2000, the campaign finished at about $3,541,000, again surpassing the target set.

"The principal reason for our success in 2000 was that so many people at all levels increased the size of their gifts," says Gerry Koffman, CJA executive director.

"It was a community effort rather than [a result of] one, two or three individuals giving a lot more. What makes it even more incredible is that we started $112,000 in the hole because of the deaths of several donors who contributed in the 1999 campaign."

The Women's Campaign also exceeded its goal. The Women's Campaign, Koffman says, finished with $755,000, as compared to the $742,000 that campaign organizers expected.

In total, Koffman says, there were about 3,800 gifts, including 156 brand new gifts. Over 1,000 people contributed more than they had previously.

Winnipeg is the only jurisdiction with a two-line card that allows donors to choose how much of their contribution to direct to local needs and how much to donate to Israel or other Jewish communities overseas.

The breakdown this year was similar to last year's, with 72 percent staying in the community and the rest going abroad.

Last November, Koffman says, the Winnipeg CJA's accomplishments were recognized with a Pinhas Sapir Award at a gathering in Chicago.

The award is named after a longtime former Israeli finance minister and recognizes such factors as campaign excellence, new initiatives and overall community involvement.

Last year, five Sapir Awards were presented. Winnipeg was the only Canadian community to receive one.

One of the new areas that the CJA is looking at is developing initiatives related to bequests and endowments, Koffman says.

He reports that the target for the 2001 campaign is $3.75 million and that the new campaign team is already at work. Last year's co-chairs Marcia Cowan and Sandra Secter will again lead the campaign. Mira Buchwald and Bev Goldberg will be the new chairs of the Women's Campaign.

Secter is a past chair of the CJA Women's Campaign and board member of numerous Jewish organizations including the Jewish Federation of Winnipeg. Cowan is immediate past president of the Jewish Foundation of Manitoba and also very active in the community.

Buchwald has been a CJA canvasser for 40 years, and her father, Ralph Hamovich, is a past executive director of the CJA.

"I grew up in a Zionist household where helping others was a way of life," Buchwald says.

Goldberg grew up in the same type of committed household. The elementary school French teacher has been a CJA canvasser since she was in high school, and was co-vice-chair of the Women's Campaign for the past two years. She received the Max Nathanson Young Leadership Award winner five years ago.

Reunion to mark school's 90th jubilee

By MYRON LOVE
Prairies Correspondent

WINNIPEG — Wheels have been put been in motion for a comprehensive I.L. Peretz Folk School reunion to celebrate the school's 90th jubilee.

A meeting was held in November which was attended by 36 former students – and chaired by Laurie Mainster – to begin planning the event for the summer of 2003.

The Peretz School was established in 1914 to teach Yiddish to the children of the Jewish immigrants who had flocked to this city in the years just prior to World War I.

For the first half and more of the 20th century, Winnipeg's Jewish community was a strongly Yiddishist community and the Peretz School thrived. Because of increased operating costs in the 1970s, the school was amalgamated in 1981 with the Talmud Torah under a newly formed Board of Jewish Education.

Following the sale of the last Peretz School building, the monies were deposited with the Jewish Foundation of Manitoba and the I.L. Peretz School Trust Fund was established to create a lasting legacy in the school's name. The fund is administered by a Board of Governors consisting of all the school's living past presidents (including Mainster) and monies are applied to operating costs in perpetuity.

There have been a series of successful class reunions over the past couple of years and Mainster noted that the last Peretz School reunion was held in 1964 to commemorate the school's 50th anniversary.

A recent poll of former students in Winnipeg determined that there is widespread support for another such major reunion.

Start-up funding for the project – a sum of $5,000 – has been approved by the Board of Governors and a bank account dedicated to the program has been set up. A part-time secretary has been hired to look after correspondence, meeting reports and other needs that will come up.

Over the next three months, organizers are focusing on building up a databank of names of former students. A phone line has been established at the home of Peretz School graduate Mindy Zabenskie (204-582-2003), as well as an e-mail address – peretzschoolreunion@hotmail.com. So far there are 400 names in the databank.

To further publicize the reunion, a message has been included on the Yiddish Web site, Mendele, and there will be ads inserted in the major Canadian Jewish newspapers.

CJC calls for deportation of Nazi in B.C.

By MARLANE PRESS
Pacific Correspondent

VANCOUVER — Canadian Jewish Congress (CJC) is stepping up its efforts to have the federal War Crimes Unit deport a former Nazi guard convicted in Italy of murdering Jewish civilians.

Deportation and denaturalization procedures for East Vancouver resident Michael Seifert are moving more slowly than CJC would like.

In a similar case, a Federal Court judge last month ordered the deportation of an Ottawa man, 76-year-old Wasyl Odynsky, for knowingly concealing his role as a guard at forced labour and concentration camps between 1943 and 1944.

Seifert, a Ukrainian member of the Nazi SS, also lied about his Nazi past when he applied to enter into Canada in 1951, said Jack Silverstone, executive vice-president of CJC. Now Silverstone wants to see the government take appropriate action.

"We have communicated with the Italian Embassy on this issue, but we have not yet been favoured with a reply," Silverstone said. "Nor is the War Crimes Unit releasing any information at all as to whether they are proceeding by way of an extradition. Nor are they indicating whether they are planning to proceed without waiting for any possible extradition request.

"The fact that he's living here in this country now is offensive."

In November 2000, a military tribunal in Italy found Seifert guilty on nine charges involving the torture and murder of 11 Jewish civilians in an Italian concentration during World War II.

Seifert, a retired sawmill worker, did not attend the trial but was ordered imprisoned for life. He was also ordered to pay $70,000 compensation to groups representing his victims. Seifert's camp commander was sentenced to 30 years imprisonment in 1946.

"The War Crimes Unit had an observer at the trial, so they are very familiar with this case," Silverstone said. "We'd like things to move quickly and see the denaturalization proceed commence immediately."

The Italian court heard witnesses testify that Seifert was a guard at the Bolzano concentration camp. They said he terrorized and killed civilian prisoners in 1944 and 1945. One charge referred to an incident in which Seifert tied a male prisoner to a fence and beat him to death while forcing other inmates to watch. Another charge involved the rape of a pregnant woman who was tortured using cold water and left in isolation to starve death.

"This individual was not a suspected member of a party and was not coerced," Silverstone said. "He was convicted by a western democratic country of mass murder, so there's no grey area here. We fully expect that the government will take the appropriate actions. We certainly intend to continue in our efforts by making this an international issue and we have raised this with our American colleagues on an international level."

The Italian court was told that last year Seifert transferred half his interest in his East Vancouver home to the name of his wife, Christine.

Benjamin's Farm explores farm life in Ontario

By MOURA WOLPERT
CJN Correspondent

Ezra Perlman is "Benjamin."

HAMILTON — What's it like to live on a farm?

For most people who grew up in the city like documentary filmmaker Jennifer Howe, answering that question is difficult.

But after Howe married her high-school sweetheart, Benjamin Loewith, and went to live with him on his family farm, she had all the answers she needed to put together a documentary for children about farm life.

The documentary, Benjamin's Farm, is airing this month on TVOntario for a few minutes each morning.

The farm, in Lynden, Ont., has a rich history. Benjamin's late grandfather, Joe Loewith, and grandmother, Minna, Jewish refugees from Czechoslovakia, began to work the land over 50 years ago when they came to Canada in 1938, an opportunity that was their ticket to safety.

While many of the children and grandchildren of Jewish farmers left the land to pursue other endeavours, Benjamin's dad, Carl, and uncle, David, chose to stay, becoming award-winning dairy farmers in the process.

After graduating from Ryerson University's radio and television arts program in 1998, Howe and fellow student Rakah Shah, former host of the TVO's children's program The Nook, formed their own company, August Productions. Howe had already made several videos for agricultural companies, and the two began to discuss the idea of a film for children about life on a farm.

Benjamin's Farm depicts many aspects of farm life in Ontario, including the milking barn, the goat barn, the chicken hatchery, the apiary, corn and wheat fields and other farming crops. It was filmed primarily on the Loewith farm, as well as on neighbouring land. The real Benjamin, Carl, David and David's wife, Bonnie, a family physician, appear in the film.

"I shot 40 hours of footage," said Howe. She then edited that down to 155 minutes. Unused footage, she explained, can be used for other documentaries. The Ontario ministry of agriculture has already selected several segments of the documentary to be shown in schools.

The part of Benjamin is played by five-year-old actor Ezra Perlman of Toronto. Howe said she chose Perlman because of all the children she auditioned, he was the only one who produced a realistic cow sound. "All the others just said 'moo,'" Howe quipped.

Howe raves about the young star. "He's very intelligent," she said. "We took our cue from his mom [Masha Bueller] and used only an adult vocabulary. He was fun to work with."

Howe is now working on a French version of Benjamin's Farm, which is to be shown on TVO's French channel, TFO, in September.

Anti-Israel resolution adopted

By JANICE ARNOLD
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — Concordia University students have just voted in favour of an anti-Israel resolution in a referendum open to more than 20,000 undergraduates.

The resolution, made in the name of all students, urges the Canadian government to cut diplomatic and economic ties, if necessary, "to pressure the state of Israel to grant the Palestinians an economically viable state and the right of return of all Palestinian refugees to their homeland."

The resolution also says Canada should force Israel "to respect all international laws, in particular, UN Security Council resolutions and the fourth Geneva Convention on human rights."

The resolution, headlined "Palestinian Human Rights," was included on the ballot with the elections for Concordia Student Union (CSU) leaders. Thirteen other resolutions were also put to a referendum, but this was the only foreign issue on the ballot.

The fact that the vote was relatively narrow (774-647) and the turnout so low provided members of the Hillel Jewish student association with some consolation, says co-president Avi Finegold.

"It's really a pyrrhic victory," Finegold says. "I think the Canadian government will be intelligent enough to realize that the number of students who voted for this resolution represent a very small minority. It's sort of ludicrous, almost meaningless, that 774 people can set official policy for 20,000 students. I'm comfortable that the majority do not actually support this sort of thing."

Hillel campaigned against the resolution and stepped up efforts to present Israel's case. Finegold says he is heartened that 647 students bothered to vote against the resolution given the apathy with which most view the CSU elections.

There are believed to be less than 1,000 Jewish students at Concordia, and over 4,000 Arab students. In total, only 1,855 voted at all in the CSU elections.

Finegold notes that the winning CSU slate, headed by president Sabrina Stea, is known for its Palestinian sympathies and was supported by Solidarity for Palestinian Human Rights (SPHR) and the Muslim Students Association.

The inclusion of this resolution on the student-election ballot did not generate the vitriolic rhetoric that rocked Concordia's downtown campus last fall when violence between Palestinians and Israelis was at its height. At that time, Hillel and SPHR, a mainly Arab student group that has conducted an aggressive anti-Israel campaign, were bitter opponents. Jewish students complained that they felt besieged and even physically intimidated by the pervasiveness and hostility of SPHR propaganda.

The situation escalated when the CSU called a general assembly in November to vote on a shorter anti-Israel resolution, saying its bylaws required it to call the assembly because over 100 students had signed a petition to do so.

That resolution called on Canada to pressure Israel to abide by UN resolutions 242 and 336 adopted by the Security Council in 1967 and 1973 and demanding Israel's withdrawal from the West Bank and Gaza, or else cut ties with the state.

Hillel urged students to boycott the assembly, which drew over 400 students, below the quorum of 525. Those present voted to include the resolution in the CSU elections and to make it more explicit.

In an opinion piece published in the student newspaper The Link, Farah Weizerman writes that the vote "merely represents the wishes of a calculating group within the school," and not the student body.

Weizerman writes that Concordia is no place for debating "outside political issues" because it is so ethnically diverse. Votes like this one "isolate" minority groups and jeopardize their safety, she says, pointing out that Hillel members have been "harassed, threatened or subjected to racial slurs" because of their support for Israel.

Finegold agrees. The anti-Israel resolution sets a precedent that could lead to other ethnic groups finding themselves out of favour on campus because they are seen to be on the wrong side of a political issue, he says.

Concordia rector Frederick Lowy replies to concerns about the tensions between Jewish and Arab students in the latest issue of the Concordia University Magazine.

Lowy writes that the "vigorous and, at times, acrimonious debates" have not been unusual at a university that has what he believes to be the largest number of students of Middle East origin of any Canadian university. What has been unusual is "the extent and depth of the confrontation" between the two sides.

"Many alumni and representatives of Jewish and Muslim institutions and organizations have complained of what they perceived to be biased or overly permissive attitudes on the part of Concordia's administration, while others have complained that the administration has been too strict, and has interfered with free speech and the expression of justifiable anger," he writes.

Yet, he says, any instance of harassment, intimidation, threats or violence will be "dealt with promptly, in accordance with Concordia's Code of Rights and Responsibilities."

It is "unacceptable" that some Jewish students have felt so intimidated by angry Arab students that they feel they have to remove kippot, he writes. But he also writes that "some Muslim students, who already experience general North American attitudes as hostile and stereotypical, have felt even more isolated."

In his article, Lowy says he is satisfied that the mediation helped contain "some of the excess zeal of the more militant students," but Finegold feels Lowy has painted an overly rosy picture of the outcome of the mediation effort.

"Nothing really came out of it. Things fell apart very quickly. The Palestinians kept pushing the envelope on what they can do on campus...Lowy's hands are tied. Concordia has a large number of Jewish backers, but he has to uphold free speech, and Concordia sees itself as a liberal university."

Yet, Finegold says, relations this semester between Hillel and the SPHR were calmer, more a "war of words and less a direct confrontation."

Incorrect use of power of attorney can lead to abuse

By BEN ROSE
Special to CJN

TORONTO — Giving a power of attorney to the wrong person can lead to abusive situations for a dependent person, says the director of the Centre for Advocacy for the Elderly.

Quoting one case, Judith A. Wahl said an elderly Jewish father learned too late that he had given power of attorney to a son who withdrew $10,000 from the father's bank account to put towards a new car and to use for himself.

"We handle many cases in which Jewish elderly would be the victims if they are not careful about giving control of their property to the wrong person," Wahl said.

The centre sends people to visit many senior Jewish groups, including one at the Bernard Betel Centre.

It is not generally known that a power of attorney can be restricted to certain expenditures, Wahl said. For example, if a woman has valuable heirlooms or jewelry and wants certain people to get them, she can say so in the document.

Another example was a personal one. "My mother gives me a narrow power of attorney to pay her bills while she is in Florida, but it would not allow me to take money from her account," Wahl said.

Wahl usually shows groups a video, based on actual cases handled by the advocacy centre; it shows one daughter berating her mother for a number of reasons and threatening to take control of her finances, while another daughter treats her in an understanding, kindly way. The latter explains what the power of attorney will enable her to do, and it is to this daughter that the mother entrusts her property.

Wahl said the centre often helps elderly people who are being discharged from hospital and given no choices, but are sent to the first long-term care nursing home that becomes available.

"I know a lot of hospitals are doing this, but they have no right to do it under the law, as long as the person being discharged is reasonable about the situation. We have helped people who were threatened with going to a nursing home 200 kilometres away."

Her first case involved a 72-year-old woman charged with a driving offence. The centre was able to help the woman win her case in court, Wahl said.

Wahl said the centre often acts for residents of nursing homes and retirement homes in cases of complaints over food or use of physical restraints. "We are working to make things better for the elderly in nursing homes," she said.

It is not generally known that the legislation on nursing homes allows people whose only income is their government pensions to pay less than the basic rate for their accommodations, she said. This would apply to people whose income is less than $14,000 a year. Assets, such as ownership of a home, are not considered as part of income.

"We don't do a lot of powers of attorney, except for people who have a very low income, but we are certainly willing to give advice."

Wahl, a lawyer who first entered practice in 1979, said the Centre (416 598-2656) has five lawyers and three support workers on staff.

Yiddish group comes to BJCC

By BEN ROSE
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — Evelyn Yuditsky, 83, leads a Fun With Yiddish group at Bernard Betel Centre for Creative Living and hopes to do the same at the Bathurst Jewish Community Centre (BJCC).

"My dream is to keep Yiddish alive," says Yuditsky. "My mission in life is to find out who I am and what my roots are."

Asked if she is winning her dream, she replies: "Maybe in a small way I am."

Yuditsky, who handed out election pamphlets at the age of four, was steeped in Yiddish in her Montreal home. She came to Toronto 12 years ago.

She started Fun With Yiddish at Bernard Betel without a budget or grants – about 50 people now participate twice a month. Eventually she received a budget at Betel and now sometimes invites guest lecturers to talk about their experiences. The BJCC started the group, with Yuditsky as facilitator, on a trial basis April 11.

"My secret is that I tell jokes in Yiddish or Yinglish and let people tell their own stories. They can say anything, in Yiddish if they can, or whatever," Yuditsky says. "Most of the group are people who were born in Canada but haven't had a chance to hear Yiddish spoken since their parents spoke it when they were young. But I have a few Holocaust survivors as well who want to hear Yiddish."

She tells a story about a young man who sent his mother a talking parrot for her birthday, only to discover that she cooked the bird for her dinner. "How could you do that?" her son asked. "Well, if he's such a smart bird why didn't he say something?" the mother replied.

Another of Yuditsky's favourite stories is about a woman who went from person to person asking if they spoke Yiddish, and then, in English, asked for the right time.

Yuditsky was recently married for the second time. On her first date with Ed Yuditsky, 81, she says she threw away her cane, which she was using after a hip replacement, so he would not think she was disabled. Both are executive members at Betel and the BJCC.

On that first date, "I asked Ed to hold my hand, as it was a long walk from the car to the McMichael Gallery," she says.

Her first husband, Jack Rabkin, a butcher, died three years ago in Toronto, where they had moved in 1988. She says their first years in Toronto were hard, as they had few friends.

Some time after Rabkin's sudden death, she met Yuditsky, a widower and former Hebrew teacher in Winnipeg for 30 years, at Betel Centre. He leads the junior congregation at Beth David Synagogue.

Yuditsky's parents, Rebecca and Benny Usden, who were married for 62 years, came to Montreal from Vilna, Poland, in 1909. Her mother, an early feminist, organized garment workers who were being exploited in sweat shops. Her father, who was given the name Benny by an immigration officer who couldn't get his tongue around his real name of Pinchus, was an operator, working long hours.

"He could fix anything," Yuditsky says. "He fixed our flooded basement after engineers said they couldn't do anything, by digging a trench outside the house and lining it with cement. He repaired a hole in a woman's basement pipes so well that the pipes were still holding up when the house was sold many years later."

Yuditsky brings Yiddish group to BJCC

Her mother didn't like to have her age given in public "because it made my mother older." But she has good genes, she says; her parents lived to their 90s.

Yuditsky attended Fairmont Public School and Baron Byng High School, where she met Mordecai Richler, and she was amazed when the boy she knew as a "snot-nosed brat" became a famous writer. The Usdens lived across the road from the Richlers.

"We were one of the few houses in Montreal, in those days of a dollar down and a dollar a week, that had a piano, because my mother insisted on it. As a young person, I raised money for lunches at the Folkshule by selling tickets for a dollar to people at synagogues and churches."

Later she was a counsellor at the Jewish Vocational Service in Montreal and ran a clothing store there.

Study looks at chronic pain

By LEILA SPEISMAN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Researchers doing a three-year study called the Chronic Pain Self-Management Program, hope to evaluate the effect of a low-cost educational program on those living with chronic pain.

The study, which is being supported by a grant from the Medical Research Council of Canada, is a joint project of nursing researchers from Memorial University in Newfoundland and the University of Toronto, said project co-ordinator Marjorie Hammond.

Principal investigators are Sandra Lefort of the faculty of nursing, Memorial University, and Judy Watt-Wilson, of the University of Toronto faculty of nursing. Those participating must be 19 years of age or older; they must have had pain for six months or longer; and must speak and read English.

Hammond explained that the study is for those with muscular-skeletal pain, caused by an accident, or fibromyalgia, as opposed to from an illness such as arthritis or cancer.

The program runs for six weeks, with a two-hour session each week. A specially trained Victorian Order of Nurses (VON) facilitator will lead the sessions, which will deal with such subjects as pain management strategies; relaxation techniques; exercise; nutrition; dealing with emotions and fatigue; pacing strategies; medications; communication and setting realistic goals.

Participants will receive a 150-page workbook, an audio relaxation tape and other information. There is no charge.

For purposes of the study, Hammond said, a computer will divide the participants randomly into two groups. One group will start the program a week or two after they are accepted into the program, and the second will start 12 weeks later.

Both groups complete initial questionnaires, and then after 12 weeks, six months, and 12 months.

An economic evaluation will be carried out by Peter Coyte, a health-care economist at the University of Toronto.

"The financial strain caused by suffering from chronic pain can be devastating," said Hammond.

People have to contend with "lost wages, caregiver issues, a housekeeper, assistive devices, medication, and the time off work or school by the spouse and children."

Researchers will also examine if a short training program will enable any qualified nurse to successfully manage such a project.

Hammond said that the study will include those in areas where there are no services for this kind of problem.

Groups will be held in St. John's, Gander and Corner Brook in Newfoundland; Oakville, Ont.; two sites in Toronto – one at Bathurst and Steeles, and one at Yonge and Eglinton; and through the Wascana Rehabilitation Centre in Regina, Sask.

'Financial strain can be devastating'

Sessions began in September 2000 in Ontario and in spring 2000 in Newfoundland. The last groups will begin in September of this year, and the researchers expect to publish the results in about two years.

The preliminary study, in 1995 and 1996, was developed by LeFort for her doctoral work at McGill University in 1994. It involved 110 people from the St. John's area. Results, which were published in the journal Pain in 1998, indicated that, after three months, there was "a positive impact on every day functioning and quality of life" on the participants, according to a covering letter sent to those who might be interested in referring patients.

Those interested in participating or in referring someone else can call Marjorie Hammond, 416-946-5799; Jodi Durdle, at Memorial University, 709-777-8313; or Kelly, at the Wascana Rehabilitation Centre in Regina, 306-766-5269.

Cardiac surgeon to be honoured

TORONTO — One of the world's leading cardiac surgeons, Dr. Tirone David, will be honoured in September at a tribute dinner co-sponsored by The Canadian Shaare Zedek Hospital Foundation and the Toronto General & Western Hospital Foundation.

Proceeds of the dinner, to be held at SkyDome, will benefit cardiac programs in both hospitals.

David, holder of the Melanie Munk chair in Cardio-Vascular Surgery at Toronto General Hospital, is being recognized for his innovative work in heart surgery.

"We are delighted… to pay homage to Dr. David, an outstanding physician and human being, who brings honour to our city," said Kurt Rothschild, Canadian Shaare Zedek's executive chair.

David joined the academic staff of the University of Toronto and The Toronto Hospital in 1978. He was born in Brazil and educated in his native country as well as in Europe, the United States and Canada.

David's work at the Toronto General reflects the hospital's reputation. Nearly 60 percent of all cardiac surgery in Metro Toronto is performed there and the hospital trains more cardiologists and cardiovascular surgeons than anywhere else in Canada.

David has participated in international cardiology conferences at Shaare Zedek Medical Center in Jerusalem, where he has lectured and demonstrated numerous operative procedures for patients with heart disease.

Hundreds of heart surgeons from around the globe visit David's operating theatre every year. He also travels widely demonstrating his techniques.

"Despite lifestyle changes and a significant decline in the prevalence of heart attacks, heart disease is still the No. 1 enemy of human health," said Prof. Jonathan Halevy, director general of Shaare Zedek in Jerusalem.

Eight years ago, Shaare Zedek embarked on the construction of the largest comprehensive heart centre in Israel. The facility opened in 1994 and is now one of the busiest of its kind in the world, Halevy said.

After a set of healthy quadruplets was born in Shaare Zedek to a Palestinian couple from Jerusalem's Arab suburb of Abu Tur, Halevy said he was asked how he could help bring potential rock throwers into the world.

"At Shaare Zedek politics stops at the door," Halevy said. "There are no Jews or Arabs at Shaare Zedek, just human beings."

After the signing of the Oslo accords, Halevy said, "we thought we'd get many more patients from neighbouring countries." That hasn't happened yet, he added, but until the early '90s, "seriously ill or injured Palestinians were routinely sent to Shaare Zedek."

Honorary co-chairs of the dinner include Peter and Melanie Munk and Joseph and Sandy Rotman.

U.S. report blasts PA security, but stops short of blaming Arafat

By MATTHEW E. BERGER
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

WASHINGTON — A U.S. State Department report has found the Palestinian Authority security forces "instigated and participated in anti-Israeli violence," but said it was not clear whether they acted on orders from PA Chairman Yasser Arafat.

The report has sparked renewed calls by American Jewish groups to downgrade the relationship between the U.S. and the PA, and to place some elements of the PLO and PA security apparatus on the state department's terrorism list.

The report, entitled the PLO Commitments Compliance Report, which analyzed events from June 16 to Dec. 15, 2000, also found that the Palestinian leadership has not tried to stop the current violence with Israel.

The Tanzim, the militia arm of Arafat's Fatah faction of the PLO, was particularly criticized.

"In addition to participating and encouraging demonstrations, stone throwing and shootings, Tanzim leaders incited violence, calling on Palestinians to escalate the intifadah [and]... take it into every street and every Jewish settlement, despite the PLO's agreement at the Sharm al-Sheikh summit to take steps to end it," the report said.

The report does not draw conclusions about possible sanctions against the PA or the PLO.

American Jewish groups believe the findings should lead the Bush administration to review the PA's status in Washington. Suggestions have included downgrading the status of the PLO's local office, not allowing Arafat and other Palestinian leaders to travel freely in the U.S. and classifying the PA and the PLO as terrorist organizations.

"The report makes it abundantly clear that elements of the Palestinian Authority have been actively engaged in acts of terrorism and violence against Israeli citizens," said Kenneth Bricker, a spokesman for the American Israel Public Affairs Committee. "The appropriate response by the U.S. government at this point is to immediately place Tanzim and Force 17 on the U.S. terrorist list."

Force 17 is Arafat's elite presidential guard. The state department fingered both Force 17 and the Tanzim for instigating attacks against Israelis.

However, citing conflicting reports from Israeli security services, the report said that "it is not clear if Chairman Arafat or other high level PA officials sanctioned such actions."

Morton Klein, president of the Zionist Organization of America, blasted the report as a "whitewash."

"It only encourages Arafat to believe he will never be held responsible for murder against Jews," Klein said. "It's a political mistake to absolve what is publicly known."

Some Jewish groups are opposed to adding Arafat and the PA to the terrorism list because it could sever the U.S. relationship with the PA. A more measured approach, they believe, would be to place just Tanzim and Force 17 on the list, sending a warning to the PA.

"You never want to take the extreme measure first," said one Jewish organization source.

But some left-leaning groups say any break in ties with the PA would be detrimental.

"There are many other options that those interested in diplomacy should be considering other than trying to isolate and humiliate the PA and the PLO," said Geoffrey Aronson, director of the Foundation for Middle East Peace.

Jews and the Kremlin are in uneasy relationship

At the same time, Putin has become closely involved in struggles within the Jewish community.

However, Jewish organizations in the west are especially alarmed at signs the Russian government is beginning to resume totalitarian methods traditionally linked to a hostile attitude toward Jews. An ominous expression of this trend was a news report last month that was given little publicity, but announced that Russia's secret police have resumed the investigation of complaints from anonymous informers – a tactic that was abandoned when perestroika was introduced in 1988.

The signs of a return to the methods of the former Communist regime have renewed bitter memories among Russian Jews. Whether by coincidence or not, three anti-Semitic rallies were held recently in Moscow. At one – which was organized by three movements closely associated with the Russian Orthodox Church – Boris Mironov, a leader of an extremist nationalist group and a former cabinet minister for media affairs, accused "Russia's enemies, most of whom are Jews, of having destroyed the Russian national tradition."

At a second demonstration, which was sponsored by the People's Communist Movement, the speakers urged that "all Yids" and all people of Caucasian origin be banished from Moscow.

The next day, at another rally of movements associated with the Russian Orthodox Church, the speakers called for action against the "Freemasons" – used as a code-name for Jews during the Soviet period.

Although Russian law forbids racial incitement, the police did not intervene in any of these gatherings.

Last month, two reports appeared about the increase in anti-Semitic incidents in Russia. The Union of Councils for Soviet Jews (UCSJ), an American organization that has retained this name coined during the Soviet regime, reported that Putin's "authoritarian instincts are contributing to anti-Semitism in Russia." The UCSJ report noted that Putin has earned considerable public support in the wake of his tough measures against the country's tycoons, who are despised and who, for the most part, are Jews.

The report states that "Putin's heavy reliance on the FSB [formerly the KGB] in his appointments, and his apparent lack of respect for democracy and a free press, may create new problems for Russia's Jews, who will never be saved until a democratic civil society develops."

The granting of carte blanche to Russian security agencies with a tradition of anti-Semitism constitutes an ever-present threat for Russia's Jews, says the report, a copy of which has been submitted to U.S. Secretary of State Colin Powell.

The second report appears in the latest edition of Perspectives, a bimonthly published by the Boston-based Institute for the Study of Conflict, Ideology and Policy. This report describes Putin's "inconsistent" attitude toward Russian Jews. The Kremlin has done nothing to prevent the outbreak of anti-Semitic incidents throughout the country. The Putin regime has also allowed the dissemination of anti-Semitic publications and lecture tours by foreign anti-Semitic rabble-rousers. Yet, in an unprecedented move, Putin has appeared at three specifically Jewish events, and even personally instructed the Kremlin's kitchen to make special preparations for Israeli President Moshe Katsav's visit to the Russian capital.

This paradox can be partially explained by the fact that Putin is waging a bitter war against the owner of Russia's last remaining independent television network, press tycoon Vladimir Gusinsky. The network has filed some toughly worded reports on actions carried out by the government, especially in Chechnya, and on what is currently happening in the Russian army.

Gusinsky, who escaped to Spain, was forced two weeks ago to resign his post as president of the Russian Jewish Congress (RJC), which, because of Putin's war against its leader, became a target for persecution by the Russian authorities.

In this context, the Kremlin has decided to recognize the leader of the Chabad Lubavitch chassidic movement, Rabbi Berel Lazar, as chief rabbi of Russia. Rabbi Lazar, whose rival for this position was the incumbent chief rabbi, Adolf Shayevich, was elected chief rabbi by synagogues affiliated with the Chabad movement. Rabbi Shayevich, who is identified with the RJC, had held the post for many years.

Furthermore, in an act that has been interpreted in Russia as the most flagrant example of official government intervention in the internal affairs of the Russian Jewish community, Putin recently appointed Rabbi Lazar, instead of Rabbi Shayevich, as the Jewish representative in the council that serves as liaison between the country's various ethnic communities and the Kremlin.

The UCSJ sums up the present situation with this statement: "Putin wants it both ways: By nurturing good ties with Israel and making personal gestures to Russia's Jews, he creates the impression of being a tolerant leader, eager to separate himself from the Kremlin's ugly history of anti-Jewish policies. At the same time, though, his government does little to uphold laws against the incitement of racial hatred, while he fails to condemn vicious anti-Semitic demagoguery by provincial and even national political leaders who appear to be his allies in the Duma."

UCSJ national director Micah H. Naftalin summarizes the attitude of western Jews: "By replacing one Jewish leader with another, the Kremlin is deliberately provoking divisions within the Jewish community."

Stronger Jordanian role on Temple Mount urged

By NADAV SHRAGAI
Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — The High Court of Justice sided with police last week and rejected a right-wing group's bid to open the Temple Mount to Jewish prayer.

Hours after the ruling, Prime Minister Ariel Sharon asked the security services to find an appropriate way for non-Muslims to visit the site.

The court decision came less than a day after a commission appointed by former prime minister Ehud Barak recommended the government work "secretly" to reinforce Jordan's role on the Temple Mount.

The commission's report also recommended that the government should use sanctions and pressure to force the Israel Islamic Association to cease financing Wakf construction work on the site, to restrict Muslim visits to the site, and to force the Palestinian Authority to cease its support for construction work that the report says is causing archeological damage.

The three-justice High Court panel was unanimous in ruling against the Faithful of the Temple Mount's request to be allowed to visit the Mount during the Pesach holiday. The justices cited police concerns that allowing Jewish prayer visits to the site at that time "could set a blaze across Jerusalem and the entire land that will be uncontrollable."

Except for some isolated visits by security officials, no non-Muslims have been allowed on the site in the heart of Jerusalem's Old City since the late September visit to the Temple Mount by Sharon.

The Wakf Muslim religious trust, under Palestinian Authority (PA) control, has cut off contact with Israeli authorities, including the Antiquities Authority with which it had worked in the past to safeguard the archeological integrity of the site.

The commission appointed by Barak was headed by Ami Gluska and included representatives from several agencies, ranging from the Shin Bet to the Antiquities Authority. Its recommendations to the government included a strong stand against a full-fledged conflict with the Wakf, noting that a proper working relationship with the Wakf is critical for day-to-day law enforcement on the Temple Mount.

The Gluska Commission defined Israel's four main goals at the Temple Mount site as:

- preserving the status quo and preventing any construction or digging, other than maintenance or reconstruction monitored by the Antiquities Authority;
- cessation of PA violations of agreements regarding the Temple Mount, including removal of the PA security apparatus now stationed there;
- opening the Mount to non-Muslim visitors; and
- an end to "incitement" in sermons preached by Muslim religious leaders on the Mount.

Gluska told the Committee on Jerusalem Security that one of the main conclusions of the commission he headed was that a secret channel of communication with Jordan should be opened to help Amman regain influence over the Wakf, which, since the Oslo agreements of 1993, has been under the influence of the PA.

Sanctions recommended by the commission – if necessary – to reach the four goals it cited as Israel's top interests on the Mount, included:

- putting pressure on Umm al Fahm Mayor Riad Salah, who heads the Israel Islamic Movement, the main organizer of the construction work conducted on the mount in recent years;
- limiting Muslim access to the Temple Mount, notably barring access to Muslims from the PA areas, until the PA moderates or totally halts its activities on the Mount that violate signed agreements with Israel;
- preventing any construction material or heavy equipment from entering the Temple Mount area, except in co-ordination with the appropriate Israeli authorities;
- imposing personal sanctions against PA VIPs and officials, including denying them access to Jerusalem, if the PA continues its activities on the mount; and
- taking legal action against private contractors hired by the Wakf to conduct construction work on the Mount.

Israel seeks 'strategic ally' status with U.S.

By SHELDON KIRSHNER

Ariel Sharon did not raise the issue with George W. Bush during his first official visit to Washington as prime minister last month, but he did discuss it with administration officials and congressional leaders.

The topic, Israel's pivotal strategic relationship with the United States, is a perennial one. Israel has close ties with the United States, but hopes to upgrade them.

Mideast Analysis

For the past few years, Israel has enjoyed the status of a "major non-North Atlantic Treaty Organization [NATO] ally." Israel, however, wants to be classified as a "strategic ally." This would put it on par with Canada and Britain, the United States's closest friends.

If Washington should ever accede to its request, Israel would become militarily and politically stronger, though infinitely more beholden to the United States.

Here's why:

• Israel's defence and satellite intelligence gathering co-operation with the United States would take a quantum leap.

• Israel would be given access to the technology behind the array of sophisticated weapons – principally missiles and aircraft – it currently purchases from the United States.

• Israel might be permitted to buy the latest state-of-the-art American weaponry, notably the Tomahawk cruise missile, which was used to devastating effect in the 1991 Gulf War, and the next generation fighter jet, the F-22, which is not yet operational.

• Israel could expect to receive even greater political support from the United States, the last remaining superpower since the close of the Cold War in the early 1990s.

Given these variables, a succession of Israeli prime ministers have exerted special efforts to upgrade Israel's strategic relations with Washington.

Sharon's immediate predecessor, Ehud Barak, wrung a promise out of Bill Clinton to upgrade ties. Clinton's pledge, made in July 1999, came at a particularly opportune moment. Israel and the Palestinian Authority (PA) had begun serious negotiations. Syria entered the picture at the end of that year after virtually boycotting talks with Israel since 1996. Israel was also contemplating a withdrawal from southern Lebanon, a unilateral one if necessary.

The argument Barak put to Clinton in the summer of 1999 was essentially: If Israel is prepared to take immense territorial risks to attain peace with its Arab neighbours, and thus contribute in no small measure to the stabilization of the Mideast, then Israel is surely entitled to full strategic partnership.

Hoping to broker Israeli peace treaties with the Palestinians and Syria, and mindful of Israel's desire to pull out of the quagmire in southern Lebanon, Clinton decided that talks about upgrading strategic links with Israel could be useful.

Meetings were held, but progress was glacial. Clinton concluded that an upgrade would further exacerbate the United States's strained relations with the Arab world and thus undermine its status as an honest broker in Israel's ongoing discussions with the PA and Syria.

As well, the outbreak of the second Palestinian uprising last September dampened American enthusiasm.

Due to these factors, Clinton backpedalled. By December of 2000, with less than a month left in his eight-year term, he had adopted a lukewarm attitude to the prospect of substantially upgrading strategic relations with Israel.

Barak left office in March without having achieved the strategic upgrade, but the subject remains on the front burner.

Prior to his recent visit to Washington, Sharon discussed it with U.S. Secretary of State Colin Powell in Jerusalem. In the meantime, Israel's ambassador in Washington, David Ivry, has taken up the matter with members of congress.

It is debatable whether the new Bush administration, with its emphasis on containing Iraq and possibly Iran, is really interested in enhancing strategic relations with Israel at this juncture.

But Bush, like Clinton before him, will doubtless agree to help Israel perfect the Arrow anti-missile shield.

Israel joins the media war

For better or for worse, we are living in a culture that relies increasingly on images to convey news stories. The readership of such reports, so we are told, is on the decline, and photographs are often left to convey information which, uncontextualized, may be misleading.

While photos themselves do not lie, they can be exploited for crass propaganda purposes and to create an inaccurate, emotionally-laden impression. Last October, in the opening of his address to a special session of the General Assembly called to criticize Israel, Paul Heinbecker, Canadian ambassador to the United Nations, observed that "Television is full of images which repulse decent people everywhere."

On September 30, 2000, near the start of the Palestinian uprising, the photo of the tragic death of 12-year-old Muhammad al-Durrah caught in a crossfire between Palestinian gunmen and Israeli soldiers became an iconic image of Palestinian "victimization." It is still being displayed throughout the Arab world as a reminder of how Israel has become an "oppressive Goliath." Nearly two weeks later, the images from Ramallah of the horrific lynching of two Israeli reservists momentarily tipped the "image battle" in Israel's favour.

Until now, Israel has been unwilling to participate in this kind of battle, perhaps out of reluctance to exploit the death and injury of its own citizens for propaganda purposes, as the Palestinians have. Indeed, when several children were maimed in a roadside bombing of an Israeli school bus, officials refused their mothers' requests to allow the media to view the mangled bodies.

Many in the Jewish community have wondered why Israel isn't getting its own images out. Even Shmuel Sisso, former Israeli Consul-General in New York, complained in a December letter to the New York Times that "most of the pictures... [play] down Israeli suffering. Israelis are human beings, too: we cry, bleed and mourn our dead just like our Palestinian neighbours."

Sisso's poignant argument counters Larry Towell's four-page photo spread in the Globe and Mail in November where he deliberately avoided depicting Israeli victims of the recent conflict. Instead, he showed only Palestinian victims, explaining, "That's where people are people." And in early April, a four-page spread in the Toronto Star accompanying an article by Sandro Contenta mirrored Towell's approach.

In late March, after the sniper murder of 10-month-old Shalhevet Pass, the Israeli government finally made the decision to join the media war by circulating pictures of the dead infant. Given the realities of our image-driven media, does Israel have any choice, even within the scope of Jewish values, but to join in this fray?

Family-run Furrier Provides 'Full-service' Care

Kahnert Furs on Avenue Road is a family-run business that has been serving the Greater Metropolitan Toronto area since 1957.

"We have always been known as a 'full service' furrier where customers can expect professional, knowledgeable, and personal advice on restyling, alterations, cleaning and repairs," says Dan Kahnert, the 4th generation of the family business.

During the hot summer months, he stresses that cold fur storage is essential to prevent the premature drying of the pelts and to preserve the natural oils in the skin. Cedar closets and air-conditioned homes simply lack the necessary cold temperatures, the proper humidity levels, and an adequate circulation of air.

At storage time, every fur is examined by one of the family, and should any repairs need attending to, free estimates are provided. It is important to look after any small repairs early on so that further damage is avoided.

Over the course of a dirty winter, furs can accumulate dust, grime, and dirt and therefore require a professional fur cleaning. Kahnert recommends that furs should be cleaned once a year or at least every 2 years. This special cleaning process is an effective, preventative measure that will add years of beauty and life to your furs while restoring their natural lustre and silkiness.

You may also take advantage of their trade-in policy. Kahnerts will allow you up to an additional 15% off the Spring Sales prices on any new purchase when you trade in your outdated fur.

They offer a quality selection of Canada Majestic Mink, Sheared Beaver, Canadian Lynx, Sable, "Sheared" Mink, Raccoon, Beaver, and Muskrat, in a wide range of styles, lengths, and prices.

Their selection of top quality (shearling) lamb apparel and fur trimmed cashmere round out their very unique and diverse product mix.

Kahnert Furs is located at 1702 Avenue Road (north of Lawrence) and can be reached at (416) 781-8472.

L'Chaim Retirement Home: youngsters need not apply

If the mere mention of the word "retirement" conjures up negative images, there's a new player in town that is replacing those negative images with positive, desirable ones.

In a wonderfully small, intimate building now taking shape at Sheppard and Maxwell (just west of Bathurst) — and due for completion this summer — L'Chaim Retirement Home promises to allow the more independent older members of your family to enjoy a true "golden age". So much so, kibbitzes founder Judy Cohen, that L'Chaim is like an exclusive "club" to which "youngsters need not apply."

When you consider the advantages of L'Chaim, you may indeed start to experience warm fuzzy feelings about getting older. L'Chaim has gone to great lengths to create a living environment that is uniquely different — one that offers the safety and comfort you'd expect in a retirement home with the joie-de-vivre you might not expect.

L'Chaim's team of health care and social service professionals include Lorraine Sherkin, well-known for her 30 years of devoted service at the Baycrest Centre for Geriatric Care, and Dr. Suzanna Gross, a family physician with an affinity for the elderly.

Within walking distance of banking, a public library and shopping, L'Chaim is an ideal home for retirees who enjoy their independence now, yet want to be prepared for future changes.

Among other features, L'Chaim offers the following:

- 30 single rooms, each with private bathroom, shower, air conditioning and heating controls;
- Availability of wheelchair-accessible rooms;
- Elevator access to all levels;
- Space-age acoustic features, for those who are sensitive to loud noises;
- A major weekly cleaning and linen change;
- Laundry room on every floor, for residents who wish to do their own washing and drying;
- Staff on duty 24 hours a day;
- Physician always on call;
- 24-hour security, with an emergency call system;
- Medication administered under supervision;
- A doctor to visit each resident on a regular basis;
- Counselling during the adjustment period;
- Jewish cuisine (three haymishe meals served daily in the spacious, well-lit dining room);
- Afternoon tea, and Shabbos dinner on Friday;
- A well-stocked library;
- Personal mail delivery, e-mail and internet access;
- Availability of cable TV and private phones;
- Two lounges, a TV room, and an outdoor sitting area;
- A play area, with toys, for grand- and great-grandchildren;
- A facility for private family functions;
- Visitor parking.

On site and outdoors, L'Chaim will offer many organized recreational activities, including fitness classes, musical entertainment, bingo, card games, weekly movies, special outings, and crafts. Jewish cultural programs will include Hebrew and Bible study. Holy days will be observed.

L'Chaim is a healthful, environmentally friendly, non-smoking home, where safety is paramount. To reduce the risk of falls, there are safety grab bars; and the halls have both hand rails and special non-slip flooring. Sprinkler, smoke and carbon monoxide detectors are in place.

L'Chaim is a member of the Ontario Residential Care Association, and plans to open in summer 2001. For further information, call Judy Cohen at 416-398-7898, or e-mail her at info@lchaimretirement.com.

Assuming that Israel never existed

Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

Opinion

The tiny Jewish community of Greece, which today numbers less than 5,000, is currently in a crisis.

Greece, where nationality and religion are not separate (very much like the situation in Israel), used to require that religion be indicated in both the population register and individual identity cards. The European Union demanded that the country stop this practice – which is what Israel should do with regard to the registration of nationality – and the Greek parliament repealed the requirement for the registration of religious affiliation.

By AMNON RUBINSTEIN

The Greek Orthodox Church – which has a long-standing dispute with the government over the payment of taxes on its immense real estate holdings – declared war, calling on hundreds of thousands of Greeks to demonstrate against the repeal of the registration procedure.

The head of the country's Orthodox Church, Archbishop Christodoulos, raised a storm of controversy when he proclaimed that "the Jews" (invariably with the definite article) were responsible for the cancellation of the registration requirement.

The Jews? They were the ones who pressured the EU in Brussels? In Strasbourg? Anti-Semites never allow facts to confuse them, and the assigning of immense influence to "the Jews" has always been a hallmark of anti-Semitism, whether Christian or Arab-Muslim.

It must be said, to the Greek government's credit, that it strongly protested this accusation. However, the Archbishop's words and the arrest of a Jewish member of Greece's business community on a charge of having artificially inflated the prices of stock market shares – a charge that is certainly not widespread in Greece – have generated considerable concern among the shrinking Greek Jewish community, which was magnificent before most were murdered in Nazi death camps.

This affair should interest Israelis for two reasons. First, because it has once more been proven that anti-Semitism is a strange beast: Even when you think it has become a corpse, it has the capacity to resurrect itself. Israel's new historians, in their formulation of an alternative world-view to the Zionist one, ignore the fact of anti-Jewish hatred, pretending that it never really existed.

It should be noted here, parenthetically, that Israelis are not deeply concerned with the fate of Greek Jewry. Greek anti-Semitism has never generated pogroms nor is there any cause for assuming that the lives of Greek Jews today are in jeopardy, although the reason why such an assumption does not apply is because they can always seek refuge in Israel.

The second reason for taking a deep interest in this affair is more important. Many Israelis have developed a very pessimistic outlook, believing that the lives of Jews are in danger only in Israel, whereas Diaspora Jewish communities are thriving. The proponents of this outlook argue that Jews live securely in both the West and the East, whereas in their own homeland, they are sitting ducks for murderous terrorists. The conclusion that these people draw could have far-reaching implications.

The truth is that the Diaspora today should be compared with a hypothetical situation in which (the very thought is frightening) Israel does not exist as a Jewish State. To understand Israel's importance, imagine what things would be like if the millions of Jews who have immigrated to Israel had been forced to remain in their countries of origin: The hundreds of thousands of Polish Jews after World War II, another million Jews in the former Soviet Union, and – worst of all – the millions of Jews who would have remained in Arab and Muslim countries in a period of ever-increasing Muslim fanaticism, which has led to genocide in Sudan, to the murder of Christians in Indonesia, to the extreme distress currently suffered by the Coptic community and the remnants of other Christian communities in Egypt, and so forth.

The Jews of the Diaspora can lead secure lives because the countries where Jews would be in jeopardy have few, if any, Jews in their midst – since most of the Jews live here, in Israel.

Even those who are familiar with Western Diaspora communities know that, despite their state of tranquillity and prosperity, the members of those communities always harbour the fear that the ancient spectre of anti-Semitism could come to life once more. This is the only explanation for American Jewry's silence while Jonathan Pollard faces ongoing injustice, and this is the only explanation for the deep concern that is expressed from time to time for the fate of the Jewish State even by Jews living in the very heart of a tolerant Western culture.

Jewish journalist Barbara Amiel, the wife of Conrad Black, publisher of The Daily Telegraph and The Jerusalem Post, expressed such anxiety recently. In an article called "Without Israel, Judaism is pointless" (Jerusalem Post, Feb. 23), she writes: "While organized anti-Semitism has been eliminated in the world today, the situation of the Jews hasn't fundamentally changed. Notwithstanding the moderating forces of liberalism and the fact that we can live peacefully anywhere, the same forces that turned Germany into Nazi Germany still exist. Any people such as the Jews, who do not have a country of their own, may forever be at the mercy of any virus that takes hold. We might live peacefully for the next five generations without Israel. After all, about five generations of Jews managed quite well from the time of the Hapsburg Joseph II until the end of the Weimar Republic..."

She ends her article with a statement that should reverberate in any place where the subject of Israel is discussed: "The Israelis will make their decision whether to carry on the draining struggle for a Jewish State, but all Jews, even the anti-Israel Jewish journalists in the West, may yet bear the consequences of that decision."

Zimbabwe's Jewish chief justice steps down

By SUZANNE BELLING
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

JOHANNESBURG — The Jewish chief justice of Zimbabwe agreed recently to step down, giving in to the government of President Robert Mugabe in a standoff over enforcing the nation's laws.

Anthony Gubbay, 68, agreed to go on immediate vacation until his retirement at the end of June, and will not preside over any more cases.

The conflict between the judiciary and Mugabe's government erupted last year after white farmers challenged the invasion of their land by black "veterans" of the Zimbabwean war of independence in the 1970s.

The "veterans" – only some of whom actually fought in the independence war – claimed that land reform instituted after Zimbabwe became independent in 1980 had not proceeded fast enough.

Many regarded the land reform campaign as nothing more than an exercise by Mugabe to avoid defeat in last year's elections, the first time since Mugabe took power in 1980 that he faced a serious challenge.

The country's highest court then heard two major cases that got Gubbay into trouble with the government.

The first, brought by dispossessed white farmers, asked the court to order the eviction of the invaders, despite government measures to protect them.

The second was an application by the narrowly defeated opposition party to order a recount in many key constituencies, following allegations of irregularities. Before the second application was heard, the government passed a law prohibiting any investigation of the irregularities and any vote recounts.

Gubbay – born in Manchester, England – presided in both cases. In both cases, the court ruled against the government.

Shortly after the judgments, the government verbally attacked "white and Asian judges" over the land issue. Analysts pointed out that the judges' independence had proved inconvenient to Mugabe, who ignored the court orders.

Johannesburg Rabbi Ben Isaacson, who served as a rabbi in Zimbabwe for 12 years from 1987 on and knows Gubbay, described him as a "gentleman."

"He is a legal authority of international renown, a human being of great integrity and a man who does not sacrifice his principles on the altar of expediency," Isaacson said.

Isaacson described Mugabe's actions as "thuggery," but pointed out that Mugabe does not target people because of their religion.

"Judge Gubbay's religion, and that of his colleagues, has nothing to do with it," Isaacson stressed. "The removal of judges who rule against the lawlessly rampant regime resembles what the Nazis did in the 1930s."

At the end of November, militants with the ruling Zanu party "invaded" the Supreme Court in the Zimbabwean capital, Harare, while police stood by. Though they did little damage, the militants disrupted court proceedings and sent a message of intimidation to the judiciary.

In February, Gubbay asked Justice Minister Pâtrick Chinamasa to ensure the safety of the judges, indicating that otherwise they could not continue to serve. Chinamasa, a Mugabe ally, said he could not do so.

An arrangement was made soon afterward for Gubbay to take early retirement, but later in February, Gubbay's office said Chinamasa had not honoured the arrangements and Gubbay would not resign.

He defied a ministerial order to vacate his office until another arrangement was reached on March 2.

Zimbabwe's Jewish community is small, with only some 750 Jews remaining of the 6,000 who lived there two decades ago.

Tony Leon, a Jew who heads South Africa's opposition Democratic party, criticized the Zimbabwe government's conduct after a recent visit to South Africa's northern neighbour.

"If the culture of impunity continues during the next 18 months to the general election, there will be very little to save in that country, and the effect on us will be great," Leon said. Instability in Zimbabwe can scare investors away from its southern neighbour, South Africa.

To date, South Africa has preferred to use quiet diplomacy to influence the situation in Zimbabwe, though a more forceful diplomatic approach appears to be in the cards. While recognizing the need for land redistribution in both countries, few South Africans appear to support Mugabe's methods.

Unusually, leaders of the South African judiciary have broken their silence on political issues to talk about developments in Zimbabwe.

In a joint statement, the country's two top judges – Constitutional Court President Arthur Chaskalson, who is Jewish, and Acting Chief Justice Joos Hefer – said that "unless judges are allowed to fulfill their constitutional function independently" and "without interference from the government, their judgments will lose credibility and the rule of law will be irreversibly compromised."

In a recent lecture, Chaskalson quoted American jurist Louis Brandeis.

"If the government becomes a lawbreaker, it breeds contempt for the law, it invites every man to become a law unto himself, it invites anarchy," he warned.

"The issue at stake is the thuggery of Mugabe, who, like Saddam Hussein and the other thugs of the world, will target anybody they feel like," Isaacson added.

Toronto-born songwriter propelled Sinatra to stardom

By BILL GLADSTONE
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — Twenty years after her death, Toronto-born songwriter Ruth Lowe was recently remembered in an hour-long documentary celebrating her life and achievements.

A gifted pianist, Lowe wrote a song to express her grief after her young husband, Harold Cohen, died suddenly in 1939, only two years after their marriage.

The song was I'll Never Smile Again. The Tommy Dorsey band recorded it in 1940 with a then-unknown young singer, Frank Sinatra. The recording became a hit and Sinatra was propelled to stardom.

Although she was given an honorary Grammy award and inducted into the American Music Hall of Fame a year after her death, Lowe's accomplishments have not been suitably recognized in Canada, says Tom Sandler, the younger of Lowe's two sons by her second husband, stockbroker Nat Sandler.

Lowe went on to write Put Your Dreams Away, which became Sinatra's theme song for over 20 years. She also penned innumerable lesser-known songs, including the quirky instrumental number Funny Little Pedro, which the Dorsey band recorded, and The Night You Called It A Day, co-written with comedian Milton Berle.

But it was I'll Never Smile Again that established Lowe as a major songwriter. To many, the song conveyed a popular sentiment of the war era, especially for family members of those killed overseas. Tom Sandler, who was named after his godfather Tommy Dorsey, says that his mother sat down at the piano and wrote the song in 10 minutes.

Ruth Lowe's accomplishments have not been suitably recognized in Canada, says her son Tom Sandler.

Ultimately, it went on to earn about a quarter-million dollars in royalties.

Lowe's accomplishments were celebrated in a memorable way in 1955 when she was the focus of an episode of the popular television show, This Is Your Life. Lured to Hollywood and into a television studio on a journalistic pretext, she was brought on stage before a live audience and her story retold.

Lowe handled the sudden spotlight with enormous grace, dabbing her eyes occasionally as her story was retold, and warmly greeting people who had helped shape her career whom she had not seen in years. The show had also secretly brought her sister, Mickey Cohen, and sons to California to be presented to her on national television.

As host Ralph Edwards told her, "Yours is a life that has known gaiety, love and grief, and in your despair you struck chords that found echoes in the hearts of America."

The television show marks the first time that Lowe's story has had an equivalent airing in Canada.

"I think the documentary has made people aware of who she was and what she did," says Tom Sandler, a Toronto photographer. "I had a lot of calls after the show and the comment I kept hearing was, 'I had no idea who your Mom was and what she did.'

"She wasn't a well-known person because she wasn't a performer. She was a behind-the-scenes composer in the 1940s."

"It was a wonderful documentary," adds Cohen, who contributed many memories of her sister to the show.

Although their father had been a butcher, Cohen says that there was a lot of musical talent in their household. "It was in the family, there's no doubt about it, and most of it went to Ruthie," she says.

The documentary aired in Canada on the History Channel.

Vishniac photos on show in Chicago

By RUTH WEINSTOCK
Special to The CJN

A compelling exhibition of photographs by Roman Vishniac are on display for the first time in Chicago's Spertus Museum until Aug 31, 2001.

The exhibit focuses on Jewish children playing, studying and working in the shtetlach of Eastern Europe from 1935 to 1938. Evocative recordings of Yiddish children's songs, poems and rhymes that were once an integral part of the rhythm and vitality of everyday Jewish life, accompany these poignant black and white images.

The 50 photographs on the museum's second-floor Lebeson Gallery, show children in the villages of Poland, Hungary, Russia and Romania, as shy eyes meet the viewer's gaze. There are students in their classes, youngsters sitting on a stoop in the sunshine, and boys and girls playing in the marketplaces.

It is remarkable that these gentle moments captured on film survived the Holocaust, as many of the children were shipped off and murdered.

Roman Vishniac's exhibition runs until Aug. 31, 2001.

Of the 16,000 images that Vishniac originally took, only 2,000 survived the war. He attached few notes to his photos, so exact dates and locations remain largely unknown.

Vishniac, who died in 1990, was hired in the '30s by the American Joint Distribution Committee to galvanize worldwide attention to the plight of these endangered innocents.

In order to create pictorial evidence of a way of life he and others feared would soon be erased from memory, Vishniac had to conceal his camera. He shot through the buttonhole of his coat.

Vishniac managed to preserve his photos by sending the negatives to his friend Walter Bierer, a member of the French Foreign Legion, just days prior to his arrest and internment in France. Bierer was instructed to smuggle them to Marseilles and from there to the U.S.

WATCH FOR THESE TWO BY SHOPSOWITZ

By coincidence, two Canadian television networks are broadcasting documentaries directed by Toronto filmmaker Karen Shopsowitz next month.

On May 9 at 10 p.m., TVOntario is airing the North American premiere of My Father's Camera, an hour-long NFB production and the following day, May 10 at 9 p.m., Vision TV is airing I Am a Rose: A Father's Journey, an hour-long documentary.

In My Father's Camera, Shopsowitz explores the world of home movies from the early days of the 1920s through to the amateur explosion of the modern video camera. Central to her film are the home movies made by her father, Israel Shopsowitz, who began shooting Super 8s in the 1930s when he was a Toronto high school student.

Intrigued by how "history makes its way into the frame," Shopsowitz encounters white supremacist graffiti from the Canadian West in the 1940s and wounded WWII soldiers convalescing at a Muskoka cottage.

As she makes full use of her father's films, Shopsowitz emphasizes their personal worth and fashions a fresh reflection on the enduring cultural value of home movies.

Presented as part of the series The View From Here, which offers documentaries from indepedent Canadian filmmakers, My Father's Camera is scheduled for repeat broadcast on May 13 at midnight.

For Vision TV, Shopsowitz made I Am a Rose: A Father's Journey, which followed Torontonian Ned Levitt, a year after his daughter Stacey's death in a car accident, as he climbs a mountain in Mexico that she had started to climb, and leaves a memorial to her on the summit.

The film tells the story of Stacey's life and death, and her father's struggle to come to terms with his grief.

Shopsowitz has directed and edited several award-winning documentaries, including My Grandparents Had a Hotel and the short film Angel Light.

The Spirit of the Shtetl: Early reviews are praising Simon Magus, a British film set in a 19th century Polish shtetl. The film has been called "a tale from a vanished world." According to the Associated Press, it "captures the spirit of ancient Judaic mysticism, a world of visions, apparitions, omens and maledictions."

Immigration of Jewish orphans is subject of heartfelt documentary

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

The S.S. Aquitania slid into Halifax on Sept. 15, 1947, bearing 850 immigrants from war-torn Europe.

Twenty Jewish boys and girls, aged 11 to 18, were among the passengers, the first of 1,123 Jewish orphans who would be allowed into Canada in the next year and a half.

The story of their arrival and reception in Canada is the subject of Jack Kuper's heartfelt two-hour documentary, Children of the Storm, airing on Vision TV on Tuesday, April 17 at 9 p.m, two days before Holocaust Remembrance Day.

A Toronto filmmaker and author, Kuper knows a thing or two about the topic, as he's one of the Holocaust survivors who found a new life in this country

Children of the Storm unfolds largely through the memories of the war orphans themselves, the foster parents, and the social workers and volunteers who tried to ease their adjustment to Canada.

As York University historian Irving Abella points out, they reached these shores at a moment when anti-Semitism here was at its apex.

Canada, whose immigration policy had been decidedly anti-Semitic from the 1930s onward, had, in 1942, agreed to accept a limited number of Jewish orphans.

But due to opposition from its own immigration department, the federal government reneged on its promise, dooming the children.

After the war, probably out of guilt, Sweden and France accepted a handful of Jewish orphans. Seizing on this development, the Canadian Jewish Congress, with Samuel Bronfman at its head, asked Canada to make good on its wartime pledge.

Succumbing to this pressure, the government enacted Privy Council Order 1647, on condition that the Canadian Jewish community bore the cost of absorbing the children.

Congress hired four people to search for them in displaced persons camps in Germany, where tens of thousands of survivors had been washed up in the wake of the war.

Although the children were desperate to leave Germany, Congress faced at least two major obstacles in moving them from Europe to Canada.

First, few of the Christian foster parents who had hidden Jewish children during the Holocaust showed any desire to give them up.

Second, Zionist organizations claimed these children, wishing to resettle them in what would be Israel.

Despite these hurdles, Congress succeeded in bringing slightly over 1,000 of the orphans to Canada.

In smaller Canadian centres, they were immediately placed in Jewish homes. In Montreal and Toronto, they were temporarily lodged at the Herzl dispensary and at the former Jewish library pending further arrangements.

For the children, it was not an easy transition.

Well-meaning foster parents, in the words of one psychiatrist, often did not realize they were "emotionally damaged." As a result, some foster parents could not cope.

In a few cases, the orphans felt unwanted and left out. In other instances, they were given the distinct impression that their horrific stories should be shelved and forgotten.

Although several of the youngsters were institutionalized after being unable to adjust, they were a remarkably capable and focused group, eager to normalize and Canadianize themselves.

Indeed, some of them enjoyed exceedingly successful careers in fields ranging from the theatre to business.

Even today, they are grateful to Canada and Congress for having let them begin their lives anew.

This, finally, is the message that informs Children of the Storm.

New translation of Lithuanian Jewish history

By BILL GLADSTONE
Special to The CJN

On the brink of the Second World War, Lithuanian Jews were "a poor tribe," notes Israeli professor Dov Levin in his book, The Litvaks: A Short History of the Jews of Lithuania.

Numbering some 155,000 on the eve of the Holocaust, Lithuania's Jews served as the country's millers, bakers, tailors, plasterers, glaziers, blacksmiths, wagoners and porters. Relatively few became wealthy.

By and large, Levin contends, their riches were contained in the Beit Midrash, their study halls, in which they fashioned a characteristic "intellectual-rational" approach to the Torah.

A full and elaborate history of the Jews of Lithuania cannot be contained in an ordinary-sized book, Levin notes in the introduction of this large hardcover book of nearly 300 pages.

A scholar who survived the Nazi bloodbath of his homeland, he admits being haunted by a fear that no one will be left to remember the Litvak communities he knew before their devastation.

The book is a chronological outline of four centuries of Jewish communal growth, from Lithuania's union with Poland in 1569 to German occupation and the tragedy of the Holocaust, in which almost 90 percent of the Jewish population was wiped out.

The earliest Jews in Lithuania date from the 12th century, Levin notes briefly. They built numerous impressive wooden synagogues that, although fortress-like, were too often and too easily torched. He describes the fearsome pogroms led by the great Ukrainian Cossack Bogdan Chmielnicki, known as "Chmiel the Wicked," a counterpart to the Haman of Purim lore if ever there was one.

The crisis erupted in 1648 in territories to the east, and sent thousands of Jewish refugees streaming into Lithuania. The local communities had withdrawn from the famous Va'ad or Council of the Four Lands at the end of the 16th century, so it was the Lithuanian Jewish Council that established "an official fast day in commemoration of the victims of the massacres and the synagogues that had been destroyed, and forbade Jews to wear fine clothes and jewelry for a period of three years."

The central communities were Vilna, Kovno, Volkomir, Shavli, Birzai and other cities. Levin utilizes extant statistics from the 1765 census (which itself has been lost) to provide demographic breakdowns by city and district.

Levin touches upon such illustrious sages as the legendary Vilna Gaon, whose death in 1797 sparked another major fissure between the Chassidim and their opponents, the Mitnagdim. Throughout the 19th century, yeshivot flourished all over Lithuania. But it was a time for new thinking as well. Lithuania was fertile ground for the Maskilim, followers of the Jewish Enlightenment.

The cheders, the national movements, the political activity, the mass migrations and the deportations to the Russian interior -- Levin touches upon all of these things. He conveys the lively cultural flavour of Jewish civilization in an independent Lithuania in the interwar years. The book's last section chronicles that civilization's tragic demise.

Yad Vashem originally published this book in Hebrew under the title Pinkas Hakehillot Lita. By publishing Adam Teller's English translation, Yad Vashem makes the work accessible to many readers for the first time. New material includes a rousing epilogue by Yehoshua Trigor, who helped fund the republication. Also included is an index of hundreds of Jewish communities, listed by their Lithuanian and Yiddish names. Many photographs illustrate the text.

Also of note: Harry Gordon's memoir of wartime persecution in Kovno. A Holocaust survivor, Gordon tells his story in The Shadow of Death: The Holocaust in Lithuania, a book published by the University Press of Kentucky.

Exhibit focuses on kids

Vishniac's life was saved by his wife, who was sent to safety in Sweden and later Portugal. In November, 1940, she succeeded in obtaining a visa, ultimately allowing passage to America.

Knowing the children were in imminent danger, once in the U.S. Vishniac made every effort to publicize his photos. Despite his efforts to alert President Roosevelt, he was met with polite indifference.

The photographs in the Spertus exhibit are based on a new book of Vishniac's work called Roman Vishniac: Children of a Vanished World.

Dedicated to the photographer's haunting historical record, the book is published by the University of California and co-edited by his daughter, Mara Vishniac Kohn.

The Spertus Museum hosts 78,000 visitors annually. Its programs and exhibits are dedicated to preserving Jewish history, religion, art and culture.

The ArtiFact Center is another of the museum's attractions. There, visitors young and old excavate ancient artifacts, watch craftspeople at work and experience an open marketplace and ancient theatre.

The museum is located at 618 South Michigan Avenue in Chicago, Illinois. For information phone (312) 322-1747. The Web site is http://www.spertus.edu.

TRAVEL TALK

BY BILL GLADSTONE

TWO BOOKS FOCUS ON THE JEWS OF MONTREAL

For a born-and-bred Torontonian like myself, books about Montreal qualify as travel literature, and so I have chosen this forum to briefly pay homage to two recent, wonderful additions to our literature on the Jews of Montreal.

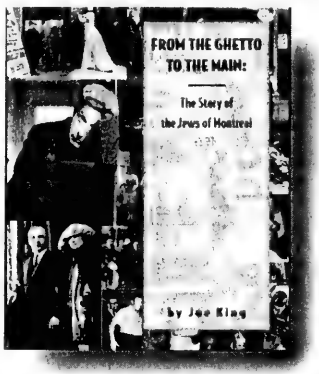
From the Ghetto to the Main: The Story of the Jews of Montreal, by Joe King, is a masterly treatment of more than 2½ centuries of Jewish history in what was once the largest Jewish community in the Dominion of Canada.



King sets the stage for his subject in five chapters that sketch the early history of Jews in New France and early Quebec. The first known Jewish subject to set foot in this territory was Esther Brandeau, who posed as a man and who refused to convert when discovered.

Eventually narrowing his focus to the Montreal community, King discusses early landowners such as Lazarus and Phoebe David, whose son David David became the first Jew born in the city (about 1764).

As it approaches the modern era, the narrative touches upon multifold aspects and themes and weaves a rich and colourful story. King excels at presenting the contours, aromas and flavours of the modern community in chapters such as The Shmata Business, Briskets and Bagels and From Rags to Great Riches: The Bronfman Story. The text is enlivened by many illustrations and sidebars.

The final chapters (including the expressively titled Exodus 401) deliver a denouement reflective of Quebec's politically troubled times. While the Montreal Jewish community has slipped demographically, King's highly impressive opus shows that the community remains vibrant and as unique as the city itself. (Published by the Montreal Jewish Publication Society.)

As a staff writer for the Kanader Adler, Montreal's Yiddish-language newspaper from the early years of the last century, Israel Medres penned innumerable short, informative essays on various aspects of Montreal Jewish life. These he collected and published in Yiddish in 1947, under the heading Montreal fun Nekhtn.

Recently Medres's granddaughter, Vivian Felsen of Toronto, translated them into English for publication as Montreal of Yesterday: Jewish Life in Montreal, 1900-1920 (Vehicule Press).

Medres wrote about the problems of immigrants, religious differences, sick benefit societies, the Workmen's Circle, the burgeoning Zionist movement, Yiddish vaudeville and theatre, the Jewish press, and the relative merits and demerits of working as a peddler, journalist, tailor or cloakmaker.

He gives a gripping thumbnail account of the trial of the anti-Semites Leduc and Plamondon, who were sued after making vile accusations against the Jews and the Talmud, and whose claims were eventually demolished in the courts.

Medres's essays bring Yiddish Montreal to life. His description of a Jewish wedding rings with a simple comic truth, and his recollection of the tiny details of life lend richness to our mental picture of this generation of Yiddish-speaking immigrants.

Medres's prose sometimes reads like a story by Sholom Aleichem or, alternately, like something only I.B. Singer could have dreamed up. For instance, he describes what happened when a Montreal man was recognized in the Gallery of Missing Husbands published by the Forward newspaper of New York as a public service.

"When the identification was made, there was a great deal of excitement. The person could be a factory worker, a small businessman, a salesman, or a clerk in a store. Mr. Kaplansky of the Legal Aid Department at the Baron de Hirsch Institute, who was in charge of such matters, was notified at once... [and] took immediate steps to contact the alleged culprit."

The identification, once proven, would cause a sensation. "The news spread to all the sweatshops in the city. Everyone talked about the man who had been recognized from the Gallery, about how respectable, decent and honourable he appeared to people who had known him. No one would have suspected him of abandoning a wife and children for another woman.

"The man, of course, was quickly arrested and sent back to the city whence he had come."

Montreal of Yesterday is an impressive memorial for Medres, who died in 1964. This lively collection is recommended reading for anyone interested in the history of Jewish Montreal.

Understated film one of the best at last year's Jewish Film Fest

By LARRY ANKLEWICZ
Special to The CJN

Voyages, one of the best and one of the most understated films shown at last year's Toronto Jewish Film Festival, has just been released on video by Mongrel Media.

Written and directed by Emmanuel Finkiel, this French film focuses on three women. Each one is from a different area of the world, yet each is in some way interconnected, if only by the shadow of the Holocaust.

Rivka, the first woman we see, is an Israeli on a bus travelling from Warsaw to Auschwitz, to revisit the horrors of her past. The bus breaks down en route and Rivka and her husband have a vociferous argument that threatens to break up their marriage.

In Paris, Regine, the second woman, receives a call from an elderly man who claims to be her father. Regine had always believed that her father had perished during the Holocaust. She is hesitant to act on the call because she is not certain this is truly her father.

And then we follow Vera, the third woman, through the streets of Tel Aviv as she searches for her cousin. An elderly woman who has just arrived from Russia, and who speaks no Hebrew, Vera, has difficulty navigating through the hustle and bustle of a strange city.

In the end, the stories of all of these women have a connection, but the search for this common thread provides an excellent story and a superior film.

You can find Voyages at those stores that usually carry videos from Mongrel Media.

In The Beginning is a television miniseries that was telecast in the United States a few months ago and dramatizes the biblical stories from Abraham through Moses.

It's been done before, but this retelling has an excellent cast that includes Martin Landau, Jacqueline Bisset and Geraldine Chaplin. The film even recounts the story of the Creation in an interesting and rather novel way.

In The Beginning was released on video a short time ago at a low sell-through price and should be available at better video stores everywhere.

Several videos have just had their prices reduced and can be purchased for under $20.

These include the hilarious British comedy, Leon The Pig Farmer and the Ben Stiller film, Keeping The Faith.

Also available is the PBS production, A Taste of Passover, featuring Theodore Bikel and the Klezmer Conservatory Band performing a special concert for the holiday.

This entertaining video features a lot of Passover music and is a joy to watch.

It has been shown a number of times on the PBS network in the United States, but this video offers everyone the opportunity to make it part of their own collection.

Just a word of warning for those interested in Jewish films. Several interesting videos are scheduled for release in the next few months, including such titles as Sunshine, Requiem for A Dream, State and Main, the new Jason Alexander film, Just Looking and the Academy Award winning documentary One Day In September.

I shall be reporting on these, and other video releases, as they come up.

Caps' Jeff Halpern checks his way to NHL eminence

By MARVIN GLASSMAN
Special to the CJN

MIAMI — Washington Capitals' Jeff Halpern is the player fans around the league love to hate.

He has the annoying ability of stepping on the ice and stopping great offensive players, like Mario Lemieux of the Pittsburgh Penguins and Pavel Bure of the Florida Panthers, from scoring goals.

With Halpern at centre, Ulf Dahlen at right wing and Steve Konowalchuk on the left, the Caps' trio was voted the best checking line in the National Hockey League this season in the March 23rd edition of The Hockey News.

Halpern's and his linemates' emphasis on checking is one of the reasons the Capitals had a winning streak of 17-6-2-1 through March 29 and were en route to capture their second consecutive Southeast Division title. Halpern's ability to win faceoffs (he's 36th in the NHL) and fight for the puck in the corners are key ingredients in the Capitals' playoff drive.

"Jeff is a great stick handler and he's not afraid to dig and win the puck at the most opportune times. He is the reason our line works so well," Konowalchuk said.

You can add to Halpern's resume a penchant for contributing to the team's offence. His 18 goals through 73 games is third best among the Caps. Halpern's contribution to the Caps far exceeded coach Ron Wilson's expectations when the Caps selected him out of Princeton University two years ago.

"Jeff is very mature and, considering he is only in his second year of NHL hockey, he is very intelligent and understands how to win at this level," coach Ron Wilson said.

Halpern has shown himself to be as tough as nails. In the dressing room prior to a game against the Panthers, Halpern had a gash on his forehead but thought nothing of it.

"I want to show my teammates that I fit in with our goal of winning games. Playing hurt, scoring, playing well all the time, when I'm on the ice [that] means victory for the team," Halpern said.

A native of Potomac, Md., Halpern is a rare hockey player, not only by being Jewish (although that's hardly a novelty anymore – Bernie Wolfe played goal for the Caps from1975–79) but by being the first player in the southeastern United States to play for his local team.

"Being selected to play for the Caps was a thrill two years ago that was unbelievable. Now, my parents in Washington and other relatives up in New York can see and watch me play all the time. The support I get and the feeling that I get to see people from my neighbourhood at the game just adds to my intensity," said Halpern.

Jeff Halpern

Being born in the south posed some drawbacks for Halpern. With few local rinks available, his parents sent him to New Hampshire to play high school hockey followed by a brief stint in Canada playing for the Stratford, Ont., Junior B hockey team.

His developmental years paid off with a hockey scholarship to Princeton University in 1995. In his senior year (he graduated with a degree in economics in 1999), Halpern led his team with 28 goals and 53 assists.

"No question that my parents' sacrifice for me has paved the way to a career in hockey. From the time I first laced on skates, hockey was all that I wanted out of my life. I am glad that I have a degree in economics, but hockey is my one and only goal for now," said Halpern, 24.

Mel and Gloria Halpern raised their two children – Jeff's sister, Jenny, is a doctor in Nashville – with an understanding of Jewish culture and religion, but unlike baseball slugger Shawn Green or football quarterback Jay Fiedler, who are active in Jewish non–profit organizations, Halpern keeps his Jewishness low key.

"I am very proud of who I am. But I do not want anyone to think that I can't fit in. I want my teammates to think of me primarily as a hockey player who will do everything possible to get a win for his team," said Halpern.

Despite having played in the NHL for only two years, Halpern was selected last November as a member of the Washington Jewish Community Centre Sports Hall of Fame.

He may yet go down as the game's best-ever Jewish player and has a chance to play for the U.S. Olympic team next year.

If Olympic team organizers have doubts about his ability to play two-way hockey, they should consider that on March 3, Halpern scored two goals in a 6-1 victory over the Penguins and followed that up four days later in Pittsburgh with the game winning goal, scored with just 3:20 left to play.

If the Caps and Leafs tangle during the playoffs, Leafs fans should worry about the Halpern factor. Expect Halpern to be sent out to neutralize Leaf forwards Mats Sundin and Steve Thomas.

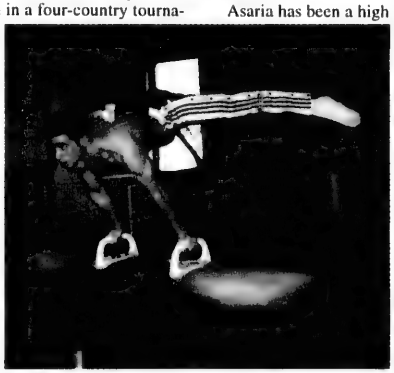
Young gymnast sets his goals very high

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Though only 18, Roy Asaria is no stranger to international competition.

The Toronto gymnast recently competed in England as part of the Canadian senior team in a four-country tournament. Canada finished second. Last year, as a member of the junior team, he competed in Puerto Rico and the year before that, he travelled to Germany for a meet. Four years ago, he was a junior athlete on the Canadian team at the Maccabi Games in Israel.



Roy Asaria

International experience is something Asaria is eager to embrace – understandable, given his goal of representing Canada at the 2004 Olympic Games in Athens.

An ambitious aim, to be sure, but not out of the realm of possibility for Asaria, who is the top junior gymnast in all of Canada, is a member of the national junior gymnastics team, and has represented Canada in senior gymnastics events. Asaria was a key member of the Ontario's gold medal team at the Canada Winter Games recently.

Asaria, who trains under Bob Carisse at the Vaughan Gymnastics Club, learned a lot in England. He witnessed first hand the rigorous training regimen of European athletes (they increase their workload substantially more than Canadians prior to a competition), and he picked up a few ideas while watching other athletes perform passes in floor exercises.

Asaria has been a high level, competitive gymnast since 1995 or so, but in recent years, he's begun to put his skills together in a package that has vaulted him to a place among the best of the elite. At the Canadian nationals in Montreal last May, Asaria finished first overall among juniors with a winning margin of half a point. The Olympic margin of victory is generally only .05 points.

He continues to excel in his best event, the pommel horse, but he's worked hard to improve other areas of weakness. In fact, he's managed to turn his worst event, the high bar, into one of his better ones, "so, I really don't have a worst anymore," he said.

Asaria, who also trains with the national team's 20 gymnasts, is the youngest of the bunch.

Striving for perfection is his goal. "I need to be consistent all-round, to go into a competition, hit every event and stick 'em," he said.

Stories that touch the heart

By ELI RUBENSTEIN ALEC GELCER

Now we have a home

In this story, the days leading up to Israel's Independence are seen through the eyes of Judy Feld Carr, then a young girl living in northern Ontario.

My father, Jack Leve, was a fur trader in Northern Ontario. He was based in Sudbury, where I grew up in one of the few Jewish families in the remote mining town.

(When I was born, it took three months to track my father down by dog-sled on Baffin Island to inform him of my birth.)

In 1947, I was an eight-year-old girl attending elementary school. The State of Israel was on the verge of being declared, but my enthusiasm for this development was not shared by my classmates and teachers.

In 1947-48, my father shipped mink, muskrat, otter and marten pelts to Israel. In the aftermath of the Holocaust, many of Europe's finest tailors were survivors who had immigrated to Israel, where they designed and manufactured high-fashion fur coats for sale in the lucrative European market. But my father's shipments had a far more crucial purpose. My father concealed bullets in the furs, which were ideal for this purpose because of their thickness. On occasion, I too would quietly slip into the basement of our home and help my father tuck the bullets into the furs bound for Palestine. When the smuggled bullets arrived, they were given to the Israeli authorities who were involved in the defence of the State of Israel against hostile Arab nations.

In May 1948, my father was visiting relatives in London, England. Excited by the news of the establishment of Israel, my father decided he had to see the land for himself. He made his way to Marseilles where he boarded the Kedma, a ship with refugees from the Holocaust. When my father arrived in Israel, he was the third visitor to be granted a foreign visa by the new Jewish state. In Israel, he shot footage on a movie camera, which he later shared with Jewish and non-Jewish groups throughout Northern Ontario, giving them their first glimpses of the maabarot, of Jerusalem, of refugees arriving in Haifa.

One of the frequent visitors to our home in Sudbury was my mother's mother, Esther Rives. Born in Russia she moved to Brooklyn with my grandfather, but she never learned to speak English. A few times a year she would take the train to Montreal on her way to Sudbury. Though she could not communicate with the porters, they all recognized her because of her regular gifts of gefilte fish and challah.

My grandmother was with me in my room on Nov. 29, 1947, when the United Nations was deciding whether to partition Palestine into an Arab and Jewish state. Hours before the vote, the outcome was uncertain, since a two-thirds majority was required. As the proceedings were broadcast my grandmother and I sat, side by side on my bed, listening to my little yellow radio as each country cast its vote.

My grandmother could not understand English, and I was not old enough to spell the names of the countries. So my grandmother gave me a pencil and sheet of paper. She divided the sheet in half and at the top of one half of the sheet she wrote in Yiddish "yes," and at the top of the other half she wrote "no." Every time a country responded in the voting, I made a check mark on the appropriate side of the sheet.

After the successful vote, my bubbie was very excited. She turned to me as I sat on my bed, looked at me with tears in her eyes, wrapped her arms around me and said: "I've lived for this moment. Now the Jews have a home. I won't see it, but you will." And my bubbie wept.

About Life

Dear Ella,

My mother recently asked me to accompany her to her lawyer as she wanted to make some changes in her will. It seems that I am always escorting my mother to some appointment or another and I really didn't think anything of it until I was informed of the changes she was making.

She took a will that she and my late father had agreed upon where their assets were fairly distributed between my family and my brother's family and she rearranged her assets so that my kids ended up with a far larger portion than my brother's kids.

Do you have any idea what kind of a rift this will cause between my brother and I? I'm sure he will feel that I had something to do with this. I tried explaining to Mom that what she is doing is unfair. However, she says it is her estate and she will divide it however she wants. What should I do about this?

Against Her Will

Dear Against Her Will,

You are right, this is unfair, but not unfair to your brother, it is unfair that you or your brother should be dictating how your mother should divide her estate.

I assume your parents worked very hard all their lives and earned every penny. That gives your mother the 100 percent right to leave whatever she wants to whomever she wants.

That being said, it doesn't change the uncomfortable position you feel you are in. Had she not made you privy to this confidential information, there would be nothing to talk about, but because she has, you can try to explain to her what kind of feelings this may cause between you and your brother. Ask your mother if it's alright with her if you mention to your brother what went on in the lawyer's office. Only if she agrees then go ahead and let him know. This will absolve you of suspicion and it will become something the two of them will have to work out.

Who knows if your mother might change her will again. The two of you should be grateful and accept whatever your mother leaves you with appreciation and grace.

Colon Cancer: Questions and Answers

This year, in Ontario alone, about 5,000 new cases of colon cancer will be identified. Unlike many cancers, colorectal cancer can be detected early. Dr. Steven Gallinger is Surgeon and Co-Director of the Steve Atanas Stavro Familial Gastrointestinal Cancer Registry.

Q: It is said that colorectal cancer is the success story in cancer research because it is the only form of cancer that can be detected and prevented before it strikes. Is this true?

A: It's a potential success story, but it's not a complete success yet. Public awareness is still needed. The majority of colorectal cancers can be prevented following the appearance of premalignant polyps. Other cancers have premalignant lesions but there is more scientific debate about whether they are actual precursors to cancer. With colon cancer, it is accepted scientifically that there is a progression from the precursor to a cancer. You could have a harmless polyp in your colon for 10 years, and it could become cancerous tomorrow, but you had 10 years to intervene and prevent cancer from developing.

Q: What can people do to prevent colon cancer?

A: There are two types of prevention. Primary prevention is when you prevent polyps from developing. This involves lifestyle: dietary change, exercise, avoiding harmful agents such as tobacco, drugs and alcohol. Making lifestyle changes will reduce your risk, but that does not guarantee that you won't get it. Secondary prevention occurs when a polyp has been detected and you have it removed.
A diet high in fruits and vegetables and low in fat probably reduces your risk. Exercising probably reduces your risk. On the other hand, smoking and alcohol intake probably increase your risk. But all these lifestyle maneuvers still won't reduce your risk to zero. Genetics -- which you can't change -- also affects your risk, either raising it or lowering it, depending on your family history.

Sharon's son meets with Arafat

By ZE'EV SCHIFF
Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — Prime Minister Ariel Sharon's son Omri, met with Palestinian Authority (PA) Chairman Yasser Arafat last week, but no details of the meeting have emerged. It was their second meeting.

It is obvious these are not random meetings, but a personal channel of communication evolving between the prime minister and Arafat.

Second meeting in three weeks

Ariel Sharon has declared he would not meet Arafat while the violence continues, but he seems content to let his son act as a proxy. Omri Sharon has reported the content of the meetings to Foreign Minister Shimon Peres.

In the first meeting about three weeks ago, Omri Sharon was escorted by former Shin Bet head Yossi Ginosar. Last week, he went with the present Shin Bet chief, Avi Dichter. It is not clear if Ginosar and Dichter took an active part in the meetings.

In addition to his two meetings with the Palestinian chairman, Omri Sharon also participated, immediately after his father took office, in a meeting in Vienna with Arafat's financial and personal aide Muhammed Rashid, former director

Montrealer counters anti-Israel ad

By DAVID LAZARUS
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — A recently drafted statement in support of Israel has already been signed by more than 2,000 members of the local Jewish community.

The statement, which is being circulated in response to the anti-Israel advertisement posted by a group of anti-Zionist rabbis in such newspapers as the New York Times, the Montreal Gazette and the National Post, is not a political one, says its author, Israeli expatriate Dado Ben Brith.

"I'm not a politician," he says. "My only philosophy is that Jews all be together – that when there is a new Israeli government, that it makes the majority of Israelis happy."

Ben Brith, a local businessman long involved with the Israeli and Jewish communities in Montreal, says he received many calls from fellow Israelis incensed by the March 7th ad, which was signed by the Central Rabbinical Congress of the United States and Canada.

The News in Brief

CANADA

Three USCJ Awards

TORONTO — The United Synagogue of Conservative Judaism, Ontario region, will present its second annual Ateret Kavod (Crown of Honour) awards on May 31 at Adath Israel Congregation, honouring Canadians who have made significant contributions to Conservative Judaism and Jewish life. The three recipients are Srul Glick, composer-in-residence and choir conductor at Beth Tikvah Synagogue; Herman Gottesman, past USCJ international vice-president and a past president of USCJ's former Ontario region; and Montrealer Charles Dixter, an international vice-president and Canadian region senior vice-president.

March of the Living

TORONTO — Almost 200 Canadian students (77 from Toronto and 113 from Montreal) were to leave Monday, as The CJN went to press, for the 2001 March of the Living. The annual two-week trip to Poland and Israel (which runs every two years for Western Canada) encompasses both Yom Hashoah and Yom Ha'atzmaut.

Siblings Sue

WINNIPEG — A Winnipeg brother and sister, famous locally for launching lawsuits and human rights complaints, are suing a university radio station for rejecting their proposal for a Jewish program. Ron and Natalie Pollock are seeking unspecified damages from the University of Manitoba and its campus radio station, CJUM, saying programmers discriminated against them by rejecting their proposal for a Jewish program, while allowing a Christian broadcast.

ISRAEL

Priestly Blessing

JERUSALEM — More than 10,000 people took part in last Tuesday's priestly blessing at the Western Wall. Hundreds of police were on hand, and the service passed without incident.

Journalist Dead?

JERUSALEM — Israeli police fear a 63-year-old Israeli Arab journalist who disappeared in a Palestinian area of the West Bank is dead. A police official said Yusef Samir entered the Palestinian-ruled town of Beit Jalla on April 4, made contact with Palestinian security forces and never returned.

WORLD

Alleged Nazi Dies

SYDNEY — An Australian citizen who allegedly helped kill thousands of Jews during World War II died here recently without ever facing trial. Jewish community leaders say the death of Karlis Ozols is a reminder of the failure of successive Australian governments to deal with alleged Nazi war criminals who immigrated to Australia. Ozols was a senior officer in the Arajs Kommando, a pro-Nazi Latvian militia held responsible for the deaths of some 100,000 civilians, including 30,000 Jews.

Disco Closure

WARSAW — The governor of the Polish province of Krakow has ordered the closure of a disco located in a former tannery where inmates of Auschwitz once worked. The dance club, located about one mile from the main Auschwitz camp, opened last summer after local authorities ignored protests and granted an investor a permit to operate the disco.

Funds Held Back

BERLIN — German Chancellor Gerhard Schroeder has rejected calls to make preliminary payments from a fund to compensate Nazi-era slave labourers. Schroeder said last week that U.S. lawsuits against German firms must first be dismissed. A U.S. judge has refused to dismiss 10 suits by Holocaust survivors against German banks, prompting lawyers for Holocaust survivors to petition a U.S. appeals court to reverse the judge's decision.

Sarajevo Haggadah

UNITED NATIONS — International experts plan to repair the famed Sarajevo Haggadah, which dates back to the 14th century. A United Nations official made the announcement last week, after three experts examined the manuscript.

Holocaust Museum

BUDAPEST — A Holocaust museum and education centre is being planned in the heart of Budapest. The facility, the first in Budapest to be dedicated to the Holocaust, will be located in the historic Jewish quarter that was the site of the Budapest Jewish ghetto during World War II. The opening is planned for next April.

Rabbi Arrested

BOCA RATON, Fla. — A 58-year-old Florida rabbi was arrested recently for sending sexually explicit computer messages to a teenage boy and arranging a meeting with him, according to the South Florida Sun-Sentinel. Rabbi Jerrold Levy, who is out on bail, resigned April 10 as associate rabbi of Temple Beth El in Boca Raton.

Court Asked to Clean Up Web Site

SYDNEY — Australian Jewish leaders have petitioned a court to order a Holocaust denier to remove revisionist material from his Internet site.

Leaders of the Executive Council of Australian Jewry argued this month before Australia's Federal Court that Frederick Toben has not complied with an order issued last October calling on him to remove the material and apologize to the Jewish community.

The October ruling by the Human Rights and Equal Opportunity Commission found that Toben's activities were illegal under Australia's Racial Hatred Act.

Toben refused to follow the directive of the commission, which does not have the power to enforce its orders.

Toben was slated to participate last month in a Holocaust denial conference in Beirut, but the meeting was cancelled.

Toben has served a prison term in Germany for Holocaust denial. He has been informed that if he returns to Germany, he will face charges under that nation's anti-racism legislation for the contents of his Internet site.

Christian groups show solidarity with Jews, Israel

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

"We left on the same plane as the Birthright Israel kids. They were going to search for their roots and so did we." – Dean Bye, executive director of the Canadian branch of Christians for Israel.

When Dean Bye boarded an El Al flight to Israel in early February, he was retracing ground he had covered many times before.

As a student of the Bible and executive-director of a non-denominational educational organization, Bye believes the time is right for Christians to bring a blessing onto Israel. So in fulfilment of his duties as a Christian, Bye brings Christians to the Holy Land to examine their roots, to stand in solidarity with Israel and the Jewish people and to help bring Jews to their ancestral land in fulfilment of holy prophecy.

Feature

Seventy-two Christians from across Canada accompanied Bye to Israel on a tour that included visits to holy sites, to Jewish neighbourhoods and to a unique meeting with the mayor of Jerusalem, Ehud Olmert.

Sharing the same El Al flight with Bye's group were Rev. John Howson and 29 Canadians and Americans affiliated with a second ecumenical Christian organization, Bridges for Peace.

Rev. Howson, the Winnipeg-based representative of the organization, led his flock on a 10-day visit to the Holy Land that also demonstrated solidarity with the Jewish people.

> "Exobus," a program conceived by Christians for Israel

At the end of the tour, Rev. Howson flew to Poland and Ukraine to see for himself the work Bridges for Peace is doing in Eastern Europe. There, working in cooperation with the Jewish Agency, the organization provides hot meals to impoverished Jews in remote villages. It also helps sponsor their aliyah by underwriting part of the costs of the "Exobus," a program conceived by Christians for Israel. The Exobus program ferries Jews from Eastern European villages to airports and seaports on the first leg of their journey to Israel.

Rev. Howson, another frequent flyer to Israel, loved his most recent trip.

"We had a wonderful time. It was safe. We never saw any violence. We felt totally at peace," he said.

Rev. Howson's group visited most of the holy sites on their agenda, though Bethlehem and Jericho were off limits because of the possibility of danger.

Jerusalem, however, was quiet. On a day spent walking through the Old City, we felt "not a ripple," Rev. Howson said. "I know it's hard to believe. [People] think there's a war on every corner. I know there are incidents, but I never saw any."

Rev. Howson, who had just visited Israel in January, felt the mood had improved in the aftermath of the prime ministerial election.

"It's amazing how resilient people are. They keep living and going on," he said.

One of the highlights for Bye's group was meeting Olmert in his office in the Old City. Prior to the meeting, Bye's group collected waters from the Jordan River, the Mediterranean Sea, the Dead Sea and the Sea of Galilee.

During their meeting, First Nations people who were part of the group mixed the Israeli waters with waters they had brought from the Atlantic and Pacific oceans and the St. Lawrence River.

The ceremony was moving for all concerned and represented symbolically the ties participants feel towards Israel, Bye said.

In addition, the group "brought lots of maple syrup and we brought humanitarian aid" which was apportioned to new olim in Gilo, which has come under fire recently from Palestinian snipers.

Members of Bye's group also donated money to help underwrite the costs of one person's aliyah.

"It was more than just a tour," Bye said. "It was an opportunity to identify with Israel, to be a blessing and to give a sense of encouragement."

Following his visit to Israel, Rev. Howson flew to Krakow, Poland where he visited with the local Jewish community.

Strengthen the bulwark, memory

From the editor's desk

As the days of the calendar accumulate into years and the years fuse inevitably into the invisible line of time, all we have left is memory.

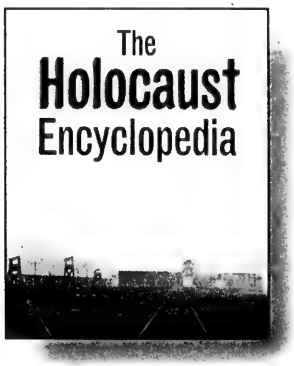
It is that inescapable certainty of the human condition that drives Holocaust deniers forward in their deceitful work.

Yet, that certainty, too, is what compels us to stand opposed to the deniers. Since memory is eventually all that remains, memory, then, must be the bulwark against them.

Today, the 26th of Nisan, is Yom Hashoah. It is a most appropriate day to reinvigorate and strengthen the bulwark of our collective memory.

To that end, I bring to the readers' attention five new Holocaust-related works. Each one is very different and each is very important. I regret that space does not allow more than merely the briefest of descriptions of the texts.

* * *



The Holocaust Encyclopedia, edited by Walter Laqueur, Yale University Press, is truly a monumental work. Laqueur and his associate editor, historian Judith Tydor Baumel of Bar-Ilan University, have compiled a compact, one-volume, richly detailed, comprehensive reference book.

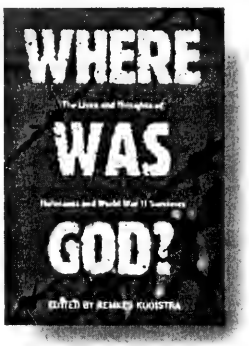
Aided by a five-person advisory board of Israelis and Americans that includes Deborah E. Lipstadt, Laqueur and Baumel have assembled contributions from nearly 100 renowned scholars from 12 different countries.

As Laqueur himself explained, the encyclopedia brings together the best of the "good work" that has been written about the Holocaust in the past two decades "for anyone who wants to learn."

The encyclopedia also features rarely seen, piercing photographs taken of Auschwitz by Polish photographer Adam Kaczkowski.

Rethinking the Holocaust, by Yehuda Bauer, Yale University Press is an intellectual tour de force. True to his nature, Bauer does not demur from struggling with the many dimensions of the Holocaust's inexplicability. In clear, crisp writing, Bauer engages the reader with information, analysis and insight. "For its [the Holocaust's] impact to effect mutual understanding, widespread peace and active, full-scale opposition to genocidal events, we all have to rethink what happened. That is what I have tried to do in this book."

The Holocaust and the Christian World, edited by Carol Rittner, Stephen D. Smith and Irena Steinfeldt, consulting editor Yehuda Bauer, Continuum Press, New York, is a thoughtful, instructive book, clearly a work of conscience. Shirking none of the difficult subjects one would normally associate with the theme, the editors have produced a useful primer of essays, images, chronologies, bibliographies and suggested further readings.



The Response of Orthodox Jewry in the United States to the Holocaust, by Ephraim Zuroff, Yeshiva University Press, Ktav Publishing House, Inc., is the first scholarly account to examine the efforts by key leaders of Orthodox American Jewry during the war to rescue Jews caught in Hitler's death machine.

Zuroff, director of the Simon Wiesenthal Centre in Israel, makes excellent use of his considerable investigative and forensic skills to tell the story of the remarkable Vaad-Hatzala (rescue committee). One of the chapters discusses the committee's efforts in trying to obtain visas for Jews to Canada.

Where Was God?, edited by Remkes Kooistra, Mosaic Press is a modest though touching, poignant work. The author is a former chaplain at the University of Waterloo who emigrated to Canada from Holland.

While at Waterloo, Prof. Kooistra created a study group that compiled oral histories of the experiences of survivors and victims who lived nearby. The book is, in part, a compilation of some of those testimonies, told without embellishment, openly, personally and very painfully.

In addition to the personal testimonies, Where Was God? contains a number of essays and reminiscences that deal, in particular, with various aspects of the treatment of the Jews of Holland, and in general, with larger, unanswerable, philosophical, theological speculations. The book takes its name from the title of one of those essays.

If some of us look for ways to strengthen our collective memory on Yom Hashoah, any of the works mentioned above would be a helpful starting point.

Educator explores problems in early childhood education

By ANNA MORGAN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Lorraine Sandler wants to know why the community is missing the boat.

Sandler, who was the principal of the Holy Blossom Nursery School for 18 years, spoke recently on Meeting the Crisis in Jewish Early Childhood Education [JECE] at the Early Childhood Association in New York.

It is crucial that we give the very best at the very beginning, Sandler said in an interview, because it is a time when the community could attract parents and bring them into the fold in a non-judgmental, non-threatening way.

But in order to really capitalize on this window of opportunity, "we need a serious commitment to Jewish early childhood education."

Right now, many early childhood teachers are leaving the field and the profession is short hundreds of teachers, Sandler pointed out.

Furthermore, the low salary, poor benefits and the perception that pre-school teachers are not much more than babysitters discourages many potential candidates from entering the profession, she said.

Yet the existing nursery programs are often bursting with children, she said, and there are long waiting lists.

Clearly, the demand for pre-school programs is there. Sandler believes it is time for the community to capitalize on that demand by revitalizing the supply of teachers.

"What is required is a fundamental change in the prioritization, perception and support structures of Jewish early childhood education, along with the substantial investment towards the marketing, training and sustaining of the JECE professional," she said.

"And this includes understanding the needs of children requiring special education attention."

In order to ensure that JECE professionals can meet the challenge of providing a positive entry point for children and their parents, we need a program that can rely on community support, Sandler said.

"Early childhood educators provide the first entry, the portal to new young Jewish families who haven't yet begun to think about their Jewish identities, their children's Jewish education and Jewish identity in the home."

Lorraine Sandler

Sandler believes that in order to alleviate the current crisis, funders and planners must recognize the need for attention for early childhood education.

Her recommendations include:

- Top quality ongoing professional development and other support must be given to our directors and teachers.
- Teachers should be given a stipend for attendance and for completion of courses.
- Pay equity and benefits for early childhood teachers must become a community priority.
- We must provide the opportunity to send our teachers to Israel to participate in a carefully structured program and experience.

"It is imperative to raise the value and respect given to early childhood faculty."

It is important not to discount that faculty, she said, because we never know what it is that will move and inspire young families to examine their Jewish identities and responsibilities.

Israel's young leaders visit Toronto

TORONTO — A delegation of young leaders representing Israel's Eilat-Eilot region were here recently to meet with their counterparts from UJA FEDERATION of Greater Toronto, as part of its Partnership 2000 initiative.

The nine young adults – ranging in age from their early 20's to their late 30's – were here to share ideas with UJA Toronto's Young Leadership Network before attending a national Young Leadership Conference in Ottawa.

A similar delegation of young leaders from Toronto visited the Eilat-Eilot region, which is twinned with Toronto's Jewish community, in November.

This Partnership 2000 exchange program gave Israeli and Canadian participants the opportunity to gather ideas from one another, and to form a stronger bond between Canada and Israel.

The contingent from the Eilat area began its leadership training work in September.

"I am the only one here who has been to Toronto before," said Ronit Zilbertstein Arcusin. "I was here in 1987, and I can't believe [how much the Jewish community has grown.]

"When I meet people in Toronto and they find out I'm from Israel, I can honestly feel their love and warmth," said the 31 year-old mother of one.

"It's like nowhere else here. I've been all over the world, from the Far East and Europe to the United States, and nowhere are people more proud to be Jewish than here in Toronto."

Members of the group are all volunteers from various parts of the Eilat-Eilot region, with different backgrounds and expertise. Their one common objective is to improve the quality of life for their communities, concentrating on education, cultural activities, and beautification of the area.

While here, the delegation visited the Bloor Jewish Community Centre, the Bernard Betel Centre for Creative Living, the Bathurst Jewish Community Centre, the Holocaust Education and Memorial Centre of Toronto UJA FEDERATION, and a number of Hebrew day schools and synagogues.

"I know that this program is already working," Zilberstein Arcusin said, "because my four-year-old daughter Stav, met the Toronto delegation in November. When I told her I was coming to Toronto, she looked at pictures and remembered every one of the Torontonians by name.

"We all want the same. Whether you're from Israel or Toronto – we all want to change the future for all of us," she said.

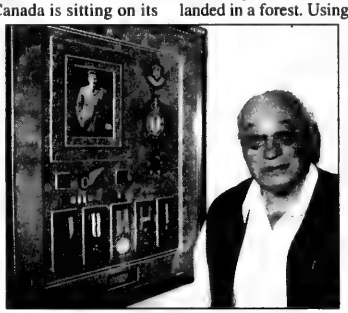
Former Buchenwald prisoner seeks compensation

By RON CSILLAG
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Joseph Sonshine feels the country for which he fought, suffered and nearly died, has let him down.

"I blame the Canadian government more than the German government," he says, sitting in his sun-drenched kitchen. "Germany has a responsibility, but Canada is sitting on its behind, not doing anything for us."

Toronto-born Sonshine, a hale 80, finds himself in a peculiar situation. He's a Jewish war veteran who receives a Canadian veterans pension, as do thousands of one-time soldiers, sailors and airmen. But for a time, he was incarcerated in Buchenwald, a Nazi concentration camp for civilians – a clear violation of the rules of war. He and others who endured the same treatment have been seeking redress for years.



Joseph Sonshine

Canada offers no special compensation for servicemen who were held either in prisoner of war or concentration camps. All it can do is pressure Germany for restitution.

In February, Veterans Affairs Canada invited Sonshine and a dozen other Canadian veterans who survived Buchenwald to come to Ottawa and complete applications for compensation.

However, the applications state clearly that they are for claimants who are not Jewish. The eight-page form is from the International Organization for Migration, and is intended for non-Jewish former slave and forced labourers, as well as those who sustained injury or the death of a child.

Now, Sonshine is waiting to fill out another form that could entitle him to payments from the $7.9-billion (Cdn) fund announced last year by Germany and German industries to compensate slave labourers. It's the same form used by thousands of Jewish Holocaust survivors across Canada who are eligible for a maximum payout of $10,000 each.

For four months, Sonshine toiled in Buchenwald doing general chores and keeping his head down. "There was no hope," he recalls. "There were razor wire and guard towers. People were dying." He and other slaves received a daily "bowl of swill... some water with greens in it." He lost nearly 80 pounds.

As far as Sonshine knows, he was the only Canadian Jewish serviceman to have been interned in a Nazi camp for civilians. Being Jewish "didn't matter that much at the time. Everyone was mistreated. It was just horrible."

His story is the stuff of Hollywood. He was a 23-year-old navigator with the Royal Canadian Air Force when his plane was shot down near the German-French border in June 1944. He managed to bail out, spraining his back in the process, and landed in a forest. Using his skills with a compass, he walked for three days, and finally arrived in France.

There, a farmer connected him to the French underground, which got him civilian clothes. He spent several weeks helping the underground plot acts of sabotage, before making it to Paris. His plan was to get to England. But a collaborator betrayed him to the Gestapo and while in prison, he was informed that he would be shot.

"A guard asked me what religion I was," Sonshine recalls. "I wanted them to know I was Jewish because I wanted a Jewish burial."

But the Allies were advancing on Paris, and before the execution could take place, Sonshine and other prisoners were herded into a cattle car for the gruelling trip to Buchenwald.

"You learned to avoid trouble there, because if you got into trouble, it was serious," he says. In all, over 56,000 people perished at the infamous camp.

Sonshine was imprisoned along with 167 other Allied airmen from Canada, the U.S., Britain, Australia and New Zealand. There were 27 other Canadians and one Jew – him.

Following the war, he and others began inquiring about compensation. After years of fruitless effort, "I just gave up. I had to get on with my life." He and his wife began receiving a Canadian veterans pension only in 1990.

Of the 28 Canadian servicemen held in Buchenwald, 16 are still alive, and they formed the KLB (Konzentrationslager Buchenwald) Club to lobby Ottawa for help with compensation from Germany.

The United States has had more success in its discussions with Germany. U.S. servicemen who survived civilian concentration camps are reportedly entitled to about $46,000 each.

Janice Summerby, a Veterans Affairs spokesperson, told The CJN she could not discuss the particulars of Sonshine's case.

She said Canada has no policy of beefing up pensions for servicemen who were held in concentration camps or PoW facilities.

However, over the past few months, representatives of the Veterans Affairs and Foreign Affairs departments have met with German officials, and "there's a good feeling that because [the Canadian Buchenwald internees] were kept in a civilian camp, they will qualify [for compensation]."

"It's not the money I'm after," says Sonshine, president of Welded Tube of Canada Ltd., which makes steel tubing. "It's the satisfaction of knowing that they [the federal government] finally seem to be waking up."

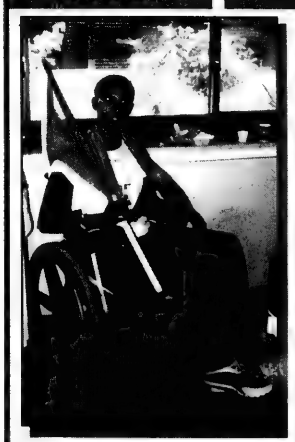
Attitude


ONCE AGAIN, BEIT HALOCHEM IS THERE FOR OUR HEROES
Asaf and his family made Aliyah to Israel in 1991. Prior to his 18th birthday he joined a combat unit in the Israeli army, stationed in the occupied territories.
A tragic incident occurred. "My good friend died on the spot when his neck was broken and 3 other soldiers with me were injured."
Asaf was hospitalized for 3 months. At first he was unaware of the extent of his injuries, but as Asaf weaved in and out of consciousness, the horror of his reality began to set in. Asaf's injuries were critical and his entire leg was amputated.
Beit Halochem was immediately there to help Asaf. Their representatives visited him regularly, offering him encouragement, guidance, support and most recently, found suitable housing for him. When discharged from hospital, Asaf will visit Beit Halochem daily for physio and hydrotherapy treatments. Slowly he will gain the ability to participate in the sports and recreational programs offered.
Beit Halochem is a special centre for veterans facing physical and emotional injuries. It is a place where everyone fits in, feels comfortable, is protected, welcomed and cared for.
The four Beit Halochem Centres in Israel offer both physical and emotional rehabilitation to disabled veterans and their families.
Your support will ensure that our heroes receive the coaching, wheelchairs, physiotherapy devices, specialized equipment, cultural activities and sports facilities that they need. Their needs are our top priority! Please....give generously.

Yom Hashoah v'Hagvurah

It would, ultimately, be a flawed foundation, incapable of supporting the immeasurable depth, richness and scope of Jewish identity and belonging, were we to ask future Jewish generations to embrace Judaism and Jewish peoplehood because of what the Nazis did to our people.

Yet it would be a flawed Jewish people and an irreparably diminished Judaism, if we did not ask future Jewish generations, indeed expect them, to know what the Nazis and their helpers did to our people.

The transmitting of collective, historic memory has always been our gift to our children and our debt to our parents. In collective memory, our traditions are cradled and our obligations reaffirmed.

But the need for collective memory, specifically concerning the Shoah, extends far beyond the Jewish people.

In a remarkably frank, piercing address to the German Bundestag delivered in January 1998 by renowned Israeli scholar Yehuda Bauer and published recently by Yale University Press in a collection of his essays, under the title, Rethinking the Holocaust, Bauer reflects precisely on this and many more aspects of the Shoah.

"To be reminded... of the Holocaust constitutes only a first step. To teach and study about the Holocaust and everything that transpired during the Second World War and thereafter involving racism, anti-Semitism and xenophobia... constitutes our next responsibility. We Germans and Jews depend on each other in undertaking this responsibility. You cannot carry out the task of remembering without us, and we must be sure that here, where the disaster arose, a new, human, better civilization is being constructed on the ruins of the past. Together we carry a very special responsibility toward the whole of humanity."

In the same essay, Bauer cites American sociologist Rudolph J. Rummel's "conclusion that between the years 1900 and 1987, governments and government-like organizations murdered 169 million civilians, apart from the 34 million fallen soldiers." Rummel noted that the crimes "were committed by mainly non-democratic regimes." Democracies "were responsible for only a fraction of one percent of the civilian victims."

On 26 Nisan, Jews throughout the world, gather to commemorate Yom Hashoah v'Hagvurah. We try, somehow, in the absence of true comprehension, to come to grips with the "meaning" of six million.

But as we do so this year, we ought also to keep in mind Bauer's instruction and Rummel's observation. Our "responsibility toward humanity" compels us to note some of the warning signs hovering ominously upon the horizon: violent, religious fanaticism; open, publicly pronounced anti-Semitism and a persistent anti-Israel, anti-Jewish, anti-Western, anti-democratic intolerance.

Questioning Weinfeld's argument

I recently came upon Morton Weinfeld's opinion regarding U.S. President George W. Bush ("Dubya: good or bad for the Jews?", The CJN, Feb. 22).

There is no evidence that President Bush wishes to exclude Jews from his administration. The most "public" face of the administration is that of his press secretary, Ari Fleischer. Yet Mr. Weinfeld wishes to ensure that Jews exclude themselves. How else to explain comments like "they are now on the outs" and "American Jews have survived Republican administrations before"? The last assurance will come as a relief to those, like Barbra Streisand, who thought that Cossacks had taken over the White House.

In fact, Jews have thrived thanks to Republican administrations. To give a recent example, where numerous petitions to free Soviet Jews failed, the steadfast foreign policy of Ronald Reagan succeeded in helping bring about the collapse of that oppressive system. It is in part due to Reagan that Russian Jews may today emigrate at will.

It isn't necessary for Weinfeld to demonstrate that conservative positions are wrong, or ill-considered, or outside the Jewish tradition; apparently, it is sufficient to establish that they are in the minority. This is not an argument. It is a simple-minded line of attack. To accept it is to marginalize any Jewish organizations and individuals who base their views on the Torah rather than on the editorial pages of liberal newspapers, "friends of the Jews" such as the Toronto Star.

I am a Jewish conservative. In insinuating that my beliefs are illegitimate because they are only shared with a small minority, Mr. Weinfeld advances a line of attack that necessarily robs Judaism itself of its right to exist.

Why publish such photos on page 1?

I'm sure there must be a sound journalistic reason for the two pictures on the front page of The CJN of April 12. Perhaps The CJN is making a statement about the different, albeit equally tragic ways in which children have their innocence taken at far too young an age; perhaps it is mere coincidence that the children shown grieving are Jewish, and the children shown playing at war are Palestinian; perhaps next week you will follow this with a picture of young Israeli radicals brandishing weapons, and young Palestinians mourning the loss of a friend.

Unfortunately, it is not quite clear to me what that sound journalistic reason is.

By writing these photos "depict the different values underlying Palestinian and Israeli societies," I am certain you cannot possibly mean to insinuate that all Palestinians are murderers and all Israelis victims.

Images Forever

By Leon Krym

No graveyards to visit no tombstones to lean on,
Weeping and grieving for our six million souls.

Images, memories and endless heartache
Will keep me company till the end of my days.

My father, my mentor, the man I admired
The centre of the universe, he was to me.

On Yom Kippur, in shul he stood, in kittel and tallit
And sang Kol Nidre in a voice that touched the heart.

My zayde, clad in long black coat, pockets on the sides,
Came to our house, for a glass of tea, he ever so liked.

Pockets full of sweet pears, he always had a lot,
I stood on my tiptoes to reach for what he brought.

When bar mitzvah I became wine and cake in shul we had.
To read and write I loved to, father's newspapers I read.

Kristallnacht, looting homes. Jews are the target.
Germany starts a brutal war. Innocent murdered.

At dawn abducted, forced from bed
Like cattle to slaughter shipped to death.

Trains rolling and puffing day-night long,
Human cargo aboard to Treblinka bound.

Stripped naked, of dignity robbed,
Brutally murdered, in crematoria disposed.

Silenced forever child's cry, mother's plea
Victims speak no more, only within pages of history.

Leon Krym is a survivor of the Warsaw Ghetto. He lives in Toronto.

A Holocaust chapter long forgotten

By BARUCH COHEN

Black milk of daybreak we drink it at evening we drink it a midday and morning we drink it at night we drink and we drink
we shovel a grave in the air there you won't lie too cramped
— Paul Celan, Death Fugue

Among great modern writers, some seem to possess a boundless vitality, a spiritual extravagance that, even in the face of life's suffering, causes them to profess their gratitude for the very fact of their existence.

There is Gustave Flaubert, who consecrates himself to a prose so beautiful that real life cannot touch it. And in bitterness of heart, Franz Kafka lets loose with "I am made of literature," meaning he considers himself unfit for life!

Mihail Sebastian, a towering talent, outstanding literary critic, author of several books, plays and essays on contemporary European literature, writes in his Journal 1935-1944: The Fascist Years: "I long for a concert, for a woman, for quiet, to read, to engulf myself in the pages of Gide, Proust, Balzac and Shakespeare."

Journal 1935-1944: The Fascist Years is a chronicle of the dark years of Nazism in Romania. The book's appearance reignited a great debate about the Holocaust in Romania and the centuries-old anti-Semitism in that country.

When the pages of this diary open, Sebastian is a 27-year-old, ambitious, self-involved Jewish writer living in Bucharest between the wars. His early journal entries pass over in silence the glimpses of the nightmare to come.

Within the pages of this extraordinary book, in addition to following the banal regularity of Sebastian's daily life, one encounters his love affairs, his love for literature and music, and, most shocking, his meetings with his so-called friends, young intellectuals who proved themselves to be anti-Semitic.

The most interesting pages give Sebastian's accounts of what playwright Eugene Ionescu called the "rhinocerization" of a great number of writers, authors and literary critics whom he counted as his friends – among them Constantin Noica, Mircea Eliade, Emil Cioran and Camil Petrescu, who all fell into line with the Iron Guard ideology.

Sebastian's Journal presages the brutality and the fear of these years in sharp relief. It bears resemblance to Victor Klemperer's massive journal of the years 1933 to 1935, I Will Testify to the Bitter End.

Mihail Sebastian (the pen name for Joseph Hechter) was born in 1907 to a middle-class Jewish family, in the Danube port of Braila. He was a very assimilated Jew until 1938, the year in which anti-Semitic laws and regulations began to be enforced. Sebastian had little relation to the Jewish community, but once the persecutions started, he lost his job as a literary critic for the nationalist daily Cuvîntul (The Word) and his job as the editor of a prestigious literary journal, Revista Fundatilor Regale (The Royal Foundation Review). Later, the Jewish community appointed Sebastian to be a teacher of literature at one of the Jewish high schools in Bucharest. (Jewish teachers were forbidden to teach at "Romanian" schools.)

The Journal was smuggled in a diplomatic pouch to Israel during Nicolae Ceausecsu's years. Published first in Bucharest in 1996 (Humanitas Publishing House, under the care of Gabriela Omat and Prof. Leon Volovici of Hebrew University), it was followed by a French edition in 1998 and an English version in 2000 (Chicago: Ivan R. Dee, in association with the United States Holocaust Memorial Museum).

Sebastian liked to refer to himself as a Danube Jew. But his teacher and mentor was the well-known anti-Semite, Nae Ionescu, who wrote in the preface to his book For Thousand Years (a quasi-autobiographical novel), "You are not a Romanian from the Danube. Joseph Hechter, you are a Jew who happens to live in Braila on the Danube!"

The Iron Guard massacre in Bucharest in January 1941 (considered by some scholars to be Romania's equivalent of Germany's Kristallnacht) unleashed the predictable horrors in a city terrorized by armed murderers chanting nationalistic, religious hymns. Sebastian writes: "A large number of Jews have been killed in Baneasa Forest and thrown there [most of them naked]. But it seems that another lot have been executed at the slaughterhouse."

A few days later, when Sebastian was reading Simon Dubnow's History of the Jews and learned about anti-Semitic persecution in the Middle Ages, he turned again to what had just happened in his own city: "What stuns you most about the Bucharest massacre is the absolutely bestial ferocity with which things are done." The Jews slaughtered in Straulesti were hung up on abattoir hoods, in place of split-open cattle. Stuck to each corpse was a piece of paper with the words "Kosher meat."

"I cannot find more terrible events in Dubnow," writes Sebastian.

A diary is a way of hedging one's bets against death, a kind of insurance policy for survival. One writes every day with the idea that there will be a next day, and a next. Diaries are written to ease one's mind in a time of terrible, dark days and nights, to provide some sense of stability and hope for a better tomorrow.

It is a difficult and moving experience to accompany Sebastian as he undergoes his metamorphosis from an ambitious, young, talented writer, literary critic and playwright to his role as lucid analyst of the most precarious of human conditions.

The Journal – which is a must read – takes us to the low point of the war, in 1941, when Sebastian involves us in an extended allegory composed of complex, uncanny dreams, many involving his brother, who was lost to him in France. We follow his reading of Tolstoy, Shakespeare and Thucydides, as well as his critique of the music he listen to, Mozart and Bach. But we add to this his cool accounts of Jews hung on meat hooks in a slaughterhouse or perishing by the hundreds of thousands in death marches to the killing fields of Transnistria and the savage Yassi massacre on June 19, 1941.

Sebastian describes in great detail his painful friendships with the infamous Mircea Eliade and other notorious "friends" who all, without failure, betrayed and humiliated him over these years. "Will lose Mircea for so little," he wrote, still considering "little" the indescribable suffering he endured because of his "close" friendship with Eliade!

During the war years, Sebastian, like other Jews, performed forced labour, though he was helped because he was well known. His last entry in his diary was made on Dec. 31, 1944, with the coming of troops from Russia into Romania. Just months later, on May 29, 1945, Sebastian was killed by a truck in Bucharest on his way to present a lecture on Honoré Balzac.

The recent publication of Sebastian's journal incited a powerful reaction in Romania, where it provoked an earthquake in intelligentsia circles and aroused a storm in a society that seems afraid to scrutinize its past and hesitates to admit its own contribution to the Holocaust. It is a country in which criticism of the old traditional nationalist culture is always considered an unpatriotic act, if not blasphemy.

In fact, in today's Romania, where the infamous neo-Nazi Iron Guard leader, Coreliu Vadim Tudor, almost became president in the December 2000 elections, Sebastian's book is considered a "j'accuse!" addressed to a nationalist, xenophobic society.

Sebastian's diary constitutes a powerful injunction to remember the slaughterhouse that was Romania from 1940 to 1944. His voice echoes the scream of a profoundly intelligent literary condemnation in the midst of political corruption and carnage. In the diary's last pages, he asks: "Will Romania gather the courage and the honesty to take upon herself the responsibility of the events of these horrible years?"

Today's events in Romania do not indicate a positive response to Sebastian's question. In what was once a great, creative Jewish community of 800,000 souls, and where now 8,000 frail, elderly Jews live, a virulent and vitriolic anti-Semitic press is flourishing. The Jews of postwar Romania are trying to maintain their human survival.

Sebastian's Journal is a unique document on the Romanian Holocaust. It finally brings to the fore a regrettably unknown, ignored, and disregarded page of suffering within Holocaust, and modern European, history as a whole.

The diary is preceded by an excellent, authoritative introduction by an expert in Romanian fascism and ultra-nationalism, Dr. Radu Ioanid, who is associate director of the International Program Division of the U.S. Holocaust Museum.

Baruch Cohen is a docent and speaker at the Montreal Holocaust Memorial Centre and research chair of the Canadian Institute for Jewish Research.

Opinions

The times they are a-changing

The following observations were sent to me via e-mail from Jerusalem. They convey some truths that are worth remembering.

We think our younger generation never notices anything, but in truth, young people often see much more than we adults do, and they understand more than we want to admit. It seems embarrassing to admit our shortsightedness.

Rabbi Gunther Plaut in Toronto

The following compelling observations convey some truths that we older people tend to overlook or even deny:

"The paradox of our time in history is that we have taller buildings but shorter tempers, wider freeways but narrower viewpoints. We spend more, but have less; we buy more, but enjoy it less. We have bigger houses but smaller families; more conveniences but less time. We have more degrees but less sense; more knowledge but less judgment; more experts but more problems; more medicine but less wellness.

"We have multiplied our possessions, but reduced our values. We talk too much, love too seldom and hate too often. We've learned how to make a living, but not a life; we've added years to life, but not life to years.

"We've been all the way to the moon and back, but have trouble crossing the street to meet the new neighbour. We've conquered outer space but not inner space; we've cleaned up the air, but polluted the soul; we've split the atom but not our prejudice. We have higher incomes but lower morals; we've become long on quantity but short on quality.

"These are the times of tall men and short character; steep profits and shallow relationships. These are the times of world peace but domestic warfare; more leisure but less fun; more kinds of food but less nutrition. These are the days of two incomes but more divorce, of fancier houses but broken homes.

"It is the time when there is much in the show window but nothing in the stockroom, when technology can bring this letter to you, and it is a time when you can choose to make a difference... either hit 'delete' or pass it on."

As you see, I have decided to pass it on. We like to think that ours is the greatest civilization ever – an assumption in need of serious correction.

It is not surprising that the above was written by young people, for they have not as yet developed the cataracts that prevent us from seeing ourselves.

Too close to home

On July 21, 1942, H.M. Caiserman, the Canadian Jewish Congress general secretary, sent a letter to Jewish communities across Canada, urging them to hold a nationwide day of "protest and mourning" for the "hundreds of thousands of Jews" being massacred in Europe. A copy of this letter hangs at the entrance to the exhibit Too Close to Home: Anti-semitism and Nazism in Canada, currently mounted at the Holocaust Education Centre in Vancouver.

Jean M. Gerber in Vancouver

Beside the letter hangs a copy of an Order in Council, dated April 29, 1947, permitting 500 orphans of the massacre to enter Canada under special ministerial privilege. Behind the bureaucratic language of that document lies the failure of Canada to have rescued the parents of those orphans, and, indeed, the continuing reluctance of Canada to let in any Jews but those having "the ability to adjust," as the letter puts it. Only five years separated the two letters. Only five years and millions of deaths.

Pictures in this exhibition are a pale reflection of the reality that was Jewish life in Canada until well after World War II: photographs of exclusionary signs – "Jews Keep Out/Gentiles Only;" a list of Toronto stores to be boycotted because they were owned by Jews. There was the ever-present knowledge that Jews on vacation would find hotels, beaches, golf courses, clubs and resorts closed to them; that Jews would face restricted access to housing and employment, and quotas on university and professional school entrance.

In 1945, we are reminded, the Ontario Court of Appeals upheld a restrictive covenant, the judge remarking that there was no issue of public policy here. Elsewhere in the display, we discover that until 1970, only Manitoba had any legislation dealing with hate literature; it was passed in response to Nazi sympathizer and racist William Whittaker, who advertised his views in his virulently anti-Semitic and anti-immigrant paper, The Canadian Nationalist.

Too Close to Home reminds the hundreds of school children and teachers who are visiting it that, for most of our country's existence, Canada has not been a friendly and welcoming nation. The evidence is everywhere. A few more examples:

Cartoons from La Gogle, the mouthpiece, of Adrian Arcand and Joseph Menard, depict Jews in the most scurrilous light – as sexual predators, money-grubbing pawnbrokers, powerful manipulators of innocent Christian governments, blood-sucking parasites. In the paper La Fasciste, Jews from London and Wall Street shake hands across the ocean, squeezing the blood out of a helpless victim.

Pictures show the KKK parading in Saskatchewan, and give evidence of their presence in Victoria and Vancouver, as well as in Alberta. Canadian Nazi party members are seen in swastika-laden regalia.

A newspaper article describes the forced resignation of a Dr. Rabinovitch, first Jewish intern at Montreal's Notre Dame Hospital – five hospitals went on strike until he offered his resignation. The riot at Toronto's Christie Pits, which occurred after many attacks on Jews by brown-shirted youths, is presented.

William Lyon Mackenzie King's diary entry March 29, 1938, affirms that "we must seek to keep this part of the continent free from unrest and from too great an admixture of foreign strains of blood... I fear we would have riots if we agreed to a policy that admitted numbers of Jews."

A reminder that "None is too many" was a quip by a government official, not in 1939, but in 1945, well after the horrors of the war were known and understood.

One picture is of the infamous F.C. Blair, whose paper walls kept out thousands seeking refuge before the Holocaust.

Too Close to Home is a powerful teaching tool, to be used in conjunction with teacher workshops and the public school curriculum. And it is also a painful exhibit to view.

Every image, every remembrance of the Holocaust is painful. This exhibit is particularly so because of the absences – the absence of the victims, the absence of the survivors, the total absence of human feelings on the part of the brown-shirted citizens of Canada who allowed King and Blair to build paper walls stronger than steel, which kept out the desperate Jews fleeing Hitler and his followers.

It is painful also because we want to be proud of Canada, and Too Close to Home reminds us how our country felt about us, a mere 50 years ago. It is painful because those we thought would protect us kept us out. It is most painful to know that there are still Canadians who would agree that letting in "the unassimilable races" will destroy this country.

Sharing history, sharing destiny

As I write this, my almost 15-year-old son, Joel, and his classmates from Grade 9 at the Edmonton Talmud Torah are preparing to leave on a class trip to Israel. They will spend almost three weeks travelling around Israel, learning about the geography and history of both biblical and modern Israel in a direct and interactive manner. As they engage in activities with Israeli teenagers, as they enjoy home hospitality on kibbutzim and moshavim, as they spend Shabbat with family and friends, they will come to appreciate, if not absorb, the culture of Israel.

Bruce Elman in Edmonton

The students are naturally very excited about their upcoming adventure. Why not? The program that has been planned for them by the staff of Canada-Israel Experience is extraordinary and would make even the seasoned traveller to Israel envious of these young people. There are the usual (as if anything in Israel is usual!) places and activities: Shabbat in Jerusalem, touring the ruins in Caesarea, visiting the grottos of Rosh Hanikra, sightseeing in Safed, Tiberias, Haifa and Tel Aviv-Yafo and so forth.

But they will also do rappelling in Luzit, ride wave-jumping tornado boats at Kef Yam, go off-road jeeping in the Golan, trek to the Banias, go rafting on the Chatzbani, explore the caves at Beit Guvrin, and hike the Nahal David. They will be in Israel for the concluding days of Passover, Yom Hashoah, Yom Hazikaron and Yom Ha'atzmaut (Israeli Independence Day). What a great school trip! Of course, the youngsters are excited.

However, they are also nervous and apprehensive. And so are their parents, grandparents and siblings. Why wouldn't they be? After all, they read the newspapers; they listen to the radio; and, most importantly, they watch television. And they read about and hear and see horrible events that are taking place in Israel on almost a daily basis – gun battles, rock throwing, suicide bombers, funerals. And it is hard for them to distinguish between Ramallah and Jerusalem.

And yet, in what is an amazing expression of solidarity with the children, the parents and the people of Israel, the class is still going on their trip.

It may be understandable that parents who have visited Israel on numerous occasions would still want their children to go on this trip. But the class includes some parents who have never been to Israel and others who have not been there recently. Yet they have remained committed to this experience.

And there were other obstacles to overcome as well. Based upon the view of its insurers that the trip to Israel was "high risk," the Edmonton Public School Board would not sanction it as a school-based activity. In addition to other consequences, this resulted in a higher cost to the parents. Yet the class persisted. They decided to run the trip as a parent sponsored private excursion.

A suggestion that the school plan a trip to an alternate location was rejected by the parents. A further suggestion that the class go to Israel but stay out of Jerusalem was also vetoed. Throughout the fall and winter, the parents remained positive and committed to a class trip to Israel, including Jerusalem. Rather than say, "We will go if things quiet down," they said, "We will go unless the state of affairs is so bad that we just cannot go."

I am quite pleased that the trip is going, more or less as planned. We have been on three sabbaticals to Israel. First, during the war in Lebanon, then during the intifadah, and finally during the year of the bus bombings and the Yitzhak Rabin assassination. When these events occur, people stop visiting Israel. We have seen how devastating for the economy it is when Jews stop visiting the Jewish State. More importantly, we know how crushing it is to the spirit and morale of the Israeli people when fellow Jews decide that Israel is "too high risk." If we claim the same history, we should be prepared to share in the same destiny.

I have had the merit this year that all of my children have been in Israel: my daughter Gail spent last summer at Kadimah Israel, my son David was a participant in the Birthright program in January, and now Joel is going to Israel tomorrow. I hope and pray that Joel and his classmates of the Edmonton Talmud Torah return safely from Israel and that they have a wonderful, exciting and meaningful trip. N'siah tovah!

The Holocaust was an incremental process

The "big bang" theory in science supposedly explains the origins of life on this planet, the seminal moment when a whole host of cosmic forces converged in a phantasmogoric explosion to create the universe.

Sheldon Kirshner in Toronto

No such grand theory exists to account for the origins of the Holocaust, which, as distinguished historian Christopher Browning suggests, was not predicated on a single sweeping edict but on a number of deadly incremental decisions dictated by circumstances.

Browning, a renowned specialist on the Final Solution, is based at the University of North Carolina. He believes that Germany's genocidal policy did not suddenly emerge in a blinding flash, but was rather the result of an evolutionary process that unfolded through several phases from 1939 to 1941.

He develops this convincing hypothesis in Nazi Policy, Jewish Workers, German Killers (Cambridge University Press), a stimulating collection of six essays turning on several issues in current Holocaust scholarship.

Among those questions he addresses are: How did Germany's satanic policy evolve during the first years of the war? When did the Nazi regime cross the watershed from population expulsion and decimation to systematic extermination? What role did local authorities play in shaping this policy?

Although historians have yet to find a document signed by Adolf Hitler authorizing the Holocaust – a so-called "smoking gun" – Browning has no doubt whatsoever that he was its "key ideological legitimizer and decision-maker."

In his infamous Reichstag speech in January 1939, Hitler prophesied that a world war would spell finis to European Jewry. Then, on the eve of Germany's invasion of Poland, he called for a "brutal attitude" and the "elimination of living forces" there.

Reinhard Heydrich, who was to be chief of the SS security police, was equally frank. Asked by a colleague about the tasks of the Einsatzgruppen – the roving killing squads that wreaked a swath of mayhem and death throughout Eastern Europe – he replied: "Fundamental cleansing: Jews, intelligentsia, clergy, nobles."

How were these intentions transformed into concrete policies? Nazi Policy, Jewish Workers, German Killers supplies the chronology.

Within a month of the start of World War II, Heinrich Himmler, the SS chieftain proposed a grandiose program, of which Hitler approved, of demographic engineering based on strict racial principles in accordance with Hitler's need for Lebensraum (living space) in the east, his contempt for the Slavs, and his determination to rid Germany of Jews.

From September to October 1939, the German government developed plans to eliminate Jews and gypsies from the Third Reich. The ethnic cleansing would take the form of a vast deportation and expulsion program in the farthest extremity of Germany's new eastern border, the Lublin district on the German-Soviet demarcation line.

The so-called Lublin scheme as a solution to the "Jewish question" petered out when the Nazis realized that it was simply unfeasible.

In June 1940, they seized upon another plan – deporting Jews to the French Indian Ocean island of Madagascar. When it, too, fizzled out, Germany considered a more radical approach.

It was left to Himmler, a former chicken farmer, to flesh it out. In a meeting with his associates in June 1941, about a week before German armies thrust into the Soviet Union and changed everything, he sketched out an apocalyptic vision of the war.

"It is a question of existence, thus it will be a racial struggle of pitiless severity, in the course of which 20 to 30 million Slavs and Jews will perish through military actions and crises of food supply," he mused.

Interpreting Himmler's observation, Browning concludes: "The old resettlement plans were dead, replaced by a vague genocidal vision…"

In the months to come, the Nazis would take a series of drastic steps that culminated with the extermination of civilians – Jews and non-Jews alike – throughout German-occupied Europe.

Acting on Hitler's impulses, Himmler, in July 1941, undertook what amounted to a feasibility study for the mass murder of Jews.

On Dec. 12 of that year, a day after Germany declared war on the United States, Hitler addressed top Nazi party officials. According to an entry in Propaganda Minister Joseph Goebbels' diary, Hitler said: "The world war is here, the destruction of the Jews must be the necessary consequence…"

In line with its new draconian policy, Germany adopted two measures within days of each other: the deportation of German Jews and a ban on emigration, which the Nazis had zealously promoted.

During this period, sites for future death camps in Chelmno and Belzec were chosen. By the autumn of 1941, experimental gassings of Soviet prisoners of war and Jewish civilians had taken place in Auschwitz, which would consume about 1.5 million persons, mostly Jews.

On Nov. 15, 1941, Himmler met with Alfred Rosenberg, the minister for the eastern occupied territories, and three days later, Rosenberg gave the press a broad idea of what the government had in store for Jews.

"In the east, some six million Jews still live, and this question can only be solved in the biological eradication of the entire Jewry in Europe," he said. "The Jewish question is only solved for Germany when the last Jew has left German territory, and for Europe when not a single Jew lives on the European continent up to the Urals."

In January 1942, at the Wannsee conference attended by 15 SS and government officials, the systematic destruction of European Jewry was sanctioned.

This was a historic turning point.

The first batch of German Jews were murdered in May 1942. Their fate soon befell Jews from Slovakia and Western Europe.

According to Browning, the Nazis had no interest in keeping alive even Jewish slave labourers deemed essential to the war effort.

"All claims of Jewish indispensability to the economy were dismissed as invalid," he writes. However, Germany's obsessive campaign to destroy Jewish labour slackened toward the close of the war.

Despite the systematic nature of the Final Solution, the importance of local initiatives and improvisation cannot be underestimated, Browning says.

On June 27, 1941, for example, a German police battalion carried out a pogrom in Bialystock without formal authorization.

Further to the north, in Tilsit, Security Police executed over 500 Jewish men on the pretext that Jews had aided the Red Army and had killed and mutilated German soldiers.

Browning claims that the German Order Police – which he examined with methodical thoroughness in a 1992 book titled Ordinary Men: Reserve Battalion 101 and the Final Solution in Poland – were at the centre of the Holocaust.

Jews, oblivious of their fate, arrive in Auschwitz. [From The Auschwitz Album, published by Random House in 1981.]

This is a telling observation, since members of the Order Police were conscripted at random, were educated and socialized before the Nazi period, and were usually not card-carrying members of the Nazi party.

And yet, as he adds, they rounded up and deported Jews and slaughtered them en masse.

Since members of the Order Police were generally not ideologically anti-Semitic, there were lapses in their treatment of Jews.

Some greeted Jews politely, while still others neglected to enforce curfews and the ban on the use of public transportation.

Informed of such "abuses," one commander urged his men to be unrelentingly tough: "You must proceed ruthlessly in the Jewish actions… Racial struggle is harsh – sentimentalism is out of place."

When the moment of truth dawned, most of the recruits in the Order Police complied with orders and participated in the wholesale destruction of Jews.

Indeed, they were the essential cogs in the well-oiled machinery of death that swallowed up the Jews of Europe from France and Poland to the Soviet Union and Greece.

CJC announces plenary program

TORONTO — Canadian Jewish Congress has released an outline of the program for its upcoming triennial plenary assembly to be held at the Inn on the Park on May 6 and 7.

The assembly will bring together CJC delegates and community representatives from across the country to consider national resolutions and to participate at the installation of the new president, Keith Landy from Ontario, and his national officers.

Moshe Ronen, outgoing CJC president and acting chair of the plenary called the program "outstanding, with well-known and informative speakers and key participants from Canada, Israel and the United States."

The program covers such topics as child poverty, Holocaust restitution, contemporary anti-Semitism, the Middle East and Jerusalem, and media coverage of Jewish issues.

Among the speakers are June Callwood, columnist, author and longtime activist on social issues; Michele Landsberg, Toronto Star columnist and human rights activist; Rabbi Michael Melchior, chair of the co-ordination forum for countering anti-Semitism and deputy foreign minister of Israel; Daniel Pipes, director of the Middle East Forum and commentator on the Middle East; and Haim Divon, ambassador of Israel to Canada.

Rabbi Melchior, a featured speaker on a panel on contemporary anti-Semitism and on Israel and Jerusalem, is the son and grandson of former chief rabbis of Denmark. He has been the chief rabbi of Norway and has served as the rabbi of a Jerusalem congregation.

Rabbi Melchior was also the chair of Meimad, a modern-Orthodox party which is a part of One Israel in the current Knesset, and was elected to the Knesset in 1999. He served as minister responsible for Diaspora and social affairs under Prime Minister Ehud Barak. With the election of Ariel Sharon as prime minister, he was appointed deputy minister of foreign affairs.

In a speech given when he was minister of Israeli society and the world Jewish community, Rabbi Melchior said, "There is no arguing about Jerusalem's national and religious importance to Jews, its central role in our national upbringing and as the spiritual foundation on which [the] Zionist ethos stands.

"As minister, I have worked very hard to strengthen world Jewry's ties with Israel and have it come, involve itself and participate in what hurts us and what brings us joy. I not only accept that Diaspora Jews should have an opinion in what goes on here in Israel, be it issues of war and peace or Jerusalem, I encourage it."

A plenary media panel (see The CJN April 12) will feature Isabel Vincent, National Post columnist and author of Hitler's Silent Partners: Swiss Banks, Nazi Gold and the Pursuit of Justice; and Marcus Gee, Globe and Mail columnist and editorial writer on international and Middle East affairs.

Neil Sher, former adviser to the Canadian Justice Department on Nazi war criminals and currently chief of staff, International Commission on Holocaust-Era Insurance Claims, and Elan Steinberg, executive director of World Jewish Congress will address issues relating to Holocaust survivor restitution.

Moderators who will facilitate discussions include Rabbi Gunther Plaut, rabbi emeritus of Holy Blossom Temple and former president of CJC; Irving Abella, professor of history at York University, co-author of None is Too Many and former president of CJC; Steve Paikin, TVO host and journalist; Jim Carr, former journalist and editorial writer for the Winnipeg Free Press and current president of the Manitoba Business Council; and Mordechai Ben-Dat, editor of The Canadian Jewish News.

A gala dinner will feature a tribute to the late actor Al Waxman. It will be hosted by Peter Mansbridge and include speakers such as Richard Monette, artistic director of the Stratford Festival.

Premier Mike Harris will address the closing plenary luncheon.

Bar/bat mitzvah program perpetuates Enosh's memory

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — A new bar/bat mitzvah program at Beth Torah Synagogue will perpetuate the memory of Enosh Gaster, who had his own bar mitzvah in 1987.

Enosh, who was developmentally delayed, died in 1999 just short of his 25th birthday.

"He took tremendous pride in his bar mitzvah," said his mother Cheryl Gaster. "He did not falter when holding the Torah, and it was done with great pride and care. I would like other families to take heart from his courage."

Enosh, who was non-verbal, would rock when he was excited, said Gaster, "and it pleased him that everyone was rocking back and forth as they prayed. It was wonderful for him."

Rabbi Yossi Sapirman, spiritual leader of Beth Torah, said that when he met Gaster, "I heard about Enosh, and was driven to put together a bar/bat mitzvah program for people with disabilities."

Faye Dorfman, who has a 27-year-old daughter with special needs, "and who has great interest" in seeing the program get off the ground said her daughter attended Enosh's bar mitzvah, and "she always talks about it. She has never forgotten it – it is special to her."

His dream, Rabbi Sapirman said, was for people in the program, which they have named Enosh, to have a bar or bat mitzvah in the main sanctuary on a Shabbat twilight service.

"I knew the service did not have to be held on a Monday or Thursday [when small services are typically held]; it could be held [during] a regularly scheduled service."

He took his idea to the synagogue president and executive, he said, "and the support was unequivocal."

They plan on offering a "typical bar and bat mitzvah program – only different. The education will be suited to the needs of each child [and] will be unique to each child's ability," Rabbi Sapirman said.

If someone would wander into the sanctuary during the service, he said, "they would not know that anything was different. They would see a celebration that is alive and real.

"The traditions of the service will be preserved; we are not changing anything about the bar or bat mitzvah. What we are changing is how the child will participate. We recognize each child's uniqueness."

Gaster acknowledged Rabbi Moshe Stern of Shaarei Tefillah, "who did not question the idea of Enosh having a bar mitzvah at his synagogue. I am delighted that Beth Torah is having an organized program."

Beth Torah wants to offer "everyone the opportunity to have a bar or bat mitzvah. We are searching for educators and we will tap into the resources that they have built up over the years," said Rabbi Sapirman.

The rabbi, who has been at the synagogue for three years, said that "it is a gift to be where I am; not to use that gift would be a shame. The synagogue has given me a haven for my ideas.

"We are offering a safe place where families and children will be accepted for who they are, where the achievements of every child are acknowledged and celebrated."

The rabbi will assure parents "who have never dreamed about making a bar mitzvah for their child that it can happen. It is worth the risk, and everything will be fine," said Gaster.

The bar or bat mitzvah is also important for the child's siblings, she said. "At Enosh's service, his brother, who is four years younger, got a sense of the rite of passage for a Jewish male."

The essence of a bar or bat mitzvah is that it happens at a certain age, Rabbi Sapirman said, "but we do not want parents to opt out. If the child did not have the opportunity at the time, we want parents to feel free to come in."

A new bar/bat mitzvah program at Beth Torah Synagogue is being named in memory of Enosh Gaster, seen here at his own bar mitzvah, held in 1987 at Shaarei Tefillah Congregation.

Enosh was at the peak of his health when he had his bar mitzvah, said Gaster, "and it was a wonderful memory for him; we buried him in his bar mitzvah tallit.

"This program is a very positive way to remember him; we want others to draw strength from his story," she said.

For information about the Enosh program, call Rabbi Sapirman at 416-782-4495.

Clinton to address Yad Vashem fund-raiser

By RON CSILLAG
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — The Canadian Society for Yad Vashem has landed probably one of the most sought-after speakers today: former U.S. President Bill Clinton will address a fund-raiser for the society June 25 at Toronto's Hummingbird Centre.

Public response to Clinton's planned talk has been "phenomenal," enthused Hank Rosenbaum, national chair of the Canadian Society for Yad Vashem. "We never anticipated such results."

Clinton, currently making rounds on the lecture circuit, will help the society raise money for a wall of remembrance in Earl Bales Park.

The project hopes to mimic the highly successful Vietnam War Veterans Memorial in Washington, D.C., Rosenbaum explained.

Called "Unto Every Person There is a Name," the project is expected to be unveiled in September. Plans call for some 10,000 names of Holocaust victims to be etched onto eight black granite walls that will ring the Yad Vashem Holocaust Memorial obelisk in the park.

A separate wall will be dedicated to the names of Righteous Among the Nations and to survivors who died after 1945. The cost of inscribing names, dates, home towns and other information will be $180 per line, Rosenbaum said.

Clinton's presence should go a long way toward defraying costs, he pointed out. Tickets for his talk will go on sale April 20th for $150, $200 and $250. A corporate fund-raising dinner planned before his talk has already sold out. Rosenbaum would not say how much those tickets cost.

Neither would he reveal Clinton's Toronto speaking fee.

"We felt he's a very good draw," Rosenbaum said. "And he's been very receptive to Yad Vashem." The former president visited the Holocaust memorial and museum during a visit to Israel in his first term.

After leaving office, Clinton came under fire in some Jewish circles for having pardoned fugitive financier Marc Rich, who has made large donations to Jewish and Israeli causes.

Rosenbaum said the Canadian Society for Yad Vashem approached Clinton last October, before his term was up.

Clinton is also slated to appear at a May 2 fund-raiser for the Morgan Firestone Foundation in Hamilton. Rosenbaum said 1,100 tickets at $200 each sold out in four hours.

Israeli 'refugees' still arriving

By RON CSILLAG
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Canada is still granting refugee status to claimants from Israel, lending credence to their tales of "persecution" in the Jewish state.

According to the Immigration and Refugee Board (IRB), Canada last year accepted 16 refugees from Israel and rejected 201 others, based on 291 claims finalized. The rest were either abandoned or withdrawn.

In 2000, Canada's acceptance rate of refugees from Israel was 5.5 percent.

The acceptance rate the year before was seven percent, based on 422 claims finalized.

It's not known how many of the Israelis granted asylum by Canada are Jews or Israeli Arabs, but Jerusalem maintains that for the most part, they are Jews who left former Soviet republics and came to Israel under the country's Law of Return.

The irony of Canada granting asylum to Jews "fleeing" the Jewish haven of Israel continues to be a sore point between the two countries.

Since 1989, when the first wave of Jews were allowed to leave the Soviet Union, Israel has been trying to persuade Canada and other nations that many ex-Soviets are taking advantage of the Law of Return to springboard to the West.

Israel has always denied that it produces refugees, saying claimants' stories of persecution are spurious.

Typically, Jews from Russia and other one-time Soviet republics, who arrive here as Israeli citizens, claim that while in the Jewish state, they were denied jobs and housing, and harassed and even threatened because of mixed marriages or questionable Jewish status.

To qualify as refugees here, they must prove they have a well-founded fear of persecution should they be returned to Israel.

Canada's acceptance rate of Israeli refugees peaked in 1991 at 69 percent of all claims. The lowest rate was two percent in 1998.

Again last year, almost all the successful claimants argued their cases in Montreal, where IRB panels are known to be less sympathetic to Israel.

Four successful claims were made in Toronto, and one in Ottawa.

In a statement, Israel's Embassy in Ottawa said it is "pleased" that the number of refugee claimants dropped in 2000 over the year before.

"However, we are disappointed with the rate of acceptance, which we view as still too high," the Embassy said in a prepared statement. "As a democratic state with a legal system that is internationally recognized for its judicial fairness and independence, it is inconceivable that Israel should be a source of refugees.

"Thus, there is no reason that Canada should be accepting refugee claimants from the State of Israel."

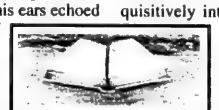
The man who first loved Torah

By RABBI MOSHE STERN



Rabbinic Reflections

The gold flickering light of the oil lamps danced on the tent wall as the old man sat in solitude throughout the quiet night. Abraham had been sitting alone for most of the evening. In his ears echoed the words of the Master of the Universe:

"Take now thine son, thine only son, whom thou lovest, even Isaac, and get thee into the land of Moriah and offer him there for a burnt offering upon one of the mountains which I tell thee of."

Abraham knew that he must obey, but that did not stop the pain from throbbing deep in his chest. The light caught the wetness in his eyes and every now and then a tear would run down a wrinkled cheek and into his gray beard.

Tomorrow, he and his son would make the long journey to the land which God had chosen. He would bind the son whom he loved so much, the son he and Sarah had waited for most of their lives. He would lay the boy upon the wood of the altar, raise the knife and... another tear fell from his eyes, then another, and another.

The journey to Moriah was slow and uneventful. Isaac and Abraham scarcely spoke a word to each other, although the father did force himself, at times, to glance at the boy lovingly. Isaac seemed proud to finally be a part of his father's business. At other times, he was told that he was too young to go on these journeys with his father.

When the small party arrived at the mountain which the Lord God had commanded, Abraham immediately began to build an altar. Without visible emotion, Abraham quietly asked Isaac to come forward to be bound. While strong ropes were being secured around his body, Isaac offered no resistance, but only stared inquisitively into the moist eyes of his father.

With a gentleness only a father could give, Abraham lifted Isaac onto the altar. Then, reaching inside his cloak, he grasped the ritual knife and raised it above Isaac's head. But as the quick and painless incision was about to be applied to Isaac's neck, an unseen hand grasped Abraham at the wrist and a voice from heaven called out:

"Abraham, Abraham, lay not thine hand upon the lad..."

It was a voice Abraham knew only too well. It was the angel of the Lord.

If allowed to speak in anthropomorphic conclusion, one might say that the Master of the Universe wiped tears from his own eyes as He gave the command to spare the life of Isaac. Since Creation, God had not found a man who loved the Lord God more than his own life and possessions. It was upon this man that He would build a people who would represent and follow the Torah.

It may be said, therefore, that Abraham was the first "Torah Jew." Not because he physically bound his son and placed him upon the altar, but because he was determined in his heart to obey the commandment of God. The Torah Jew observes mitzvot out of love and dedication to Torah, not because doing so is a socially-accepted practice.

The Torah Jew also observes all the mitzvot to the best of his ability and does not compromise any of them to personal or social circumstances. The Jew who observes all the commandments to the letter of the law, yet commits an act of hatred against another Jew, no matter who that Jew may be, is not a Torah Jew. Where is it written that one should not travel on Shabbat, yet assault the Jew who does?

Observant Jews confined to the death camps could have easily dismissed the observance of certain mitzvot because of their circumstances. It would have been difficult to find a rabbi in all of Europe who would have demanded strict observance of certain mitzvot under those conditions. But "Torah Jews" did not use their confinement as an excuse to forget the mitzvot which they had lovingly kept throughout their free lives. If a Shabbat candle was not available, one was made. If saying the Modeh Ani in the morning seemed ridiculous in the face of death and suffering, it was said anyway. When the camps were the last place to expect laughter and joy on Simchat Torah, there was dancing and singing anyway.

The song Bilvavi joyfully praises: "In my heart will I erect a sanctuary... in the sanctuary I will place an altar, for the eternal light... I will take the fire of Isaac's sacrifice and with this my singular soul, will I sacrifice before him."

It is the hope that each Jew will personally experience the sacrifice which God commanded of Abraham. Within each heart is a Moriah, a place where an altar can be built, and where the Torah can be forever kept as a sign to the world that he or she is special. For each Jew is a descendant of Abraham, a man who first loved Torah and lived its very precepts.

Never again, around the globe

By ELYSSE ZAREK
Special to The CJN

Guest voice

In commenting on the role of memory, Elie Wiesel voiced his opinion on the resilience of the Jews: "Their best characteristic is their desire to remember. No other people has such an obsession with memory."

Fifty-six years ago, as the Holocaust ended, so did a chapter in the book of European Jewry. Fifty-six years ago, the Jews of the world cried out, "Never again!" Fifty-six years ago, we vowed that we would be vigilant.

But maybe we didn't do such a good job.

When we said "never again," what did we mean? Did we mean that Jews would never again be murdered as they were in the 1940s? Does "never again" have larger implications today? Does it extend to all the people who have suffered under oppressive, totalitarian regimes since the fall of Nazi Germany?

Because if it does, then we haven't done such a good job.

Human rights abuses were intrinsic to the Holocaust; they were part of what distinguished it as one of the most grotesque and atrocious deeds in 20th-century history. And while the Holocaust was unique in many ways, these abuses were not one of them. Many other regimes have also been guilty of human rights violations.

Let's look east, across the ocean. Cambodia's Khmer Rouge came to power eight years before I was born, and by the time it ended, I was already two years old. Under Pol Pot, the country's population was halved. Mass murders took place. And the world watched silently.

Latin America also has a notorious record of human rights violations. Take Argentina as an example. During the "Dirty War," over 30,000 people were abducted, tortured and murdered. The regime's method of killing its victims was to push them out of helicopters. Alive. While flying over the ocean. After their experiences, the Argentines cultivated an expression similar to ours. Nunca mas, they say. Never more. Never more shall this happen.

But it has happened. Perhaps this comes as a sad testament to mankind: man has walked on the moon, the women's rights movement has blossomed, medical and technological breakthroughs have revolutionized the way we live, but after all we have accomplished, the basic right to live in peace is still denied to many around the globe.

During his presidential campaign in the early 1990s, Bill Clinton announced, "If the horrors of the Holocaust taught us anything, it is the high cost of remaining silent and paralyzed in the face of genocide."

We live in a global village; we cannot ignore the atrocities that are committed in our backyard. "Never again" must mean more than never again will Jews be murdered as they were during the Holocaust. It must mean that never again will we stand by idly as oppressive regimes wreak destruction on citizens of the world. It must extend to all forms and fashions of human rights abuses and to all varieties of human indifference in the face of hatred and persecution. On the dawning of a new century, let us be the guardians of memory to ensure that violence does not continue.

So as we light our Yizkor candles, let us remember the Jews who died. But let us include in our thoughts the millions of others who have perished at the hands of radical and violent regimes in the sixty-plus years since the Nazis first came to power. Let us cry out with as much kavanah as we can muster, in a voice that echoes to the heavens and back, "Never again!"

In the end, only remembrance can kindle the flame of vigilance.

Introduction to Hebrew

By MARK MIETKIEWICZ

Eliezer Ben-Yehuda would have been amazed by the Internet.

Ben-Yehuda is credited with being the inspired and obstinate visionary responsible for the rebirth of Hebrew. He took the ancient language and developed modern words and terminology to add to it. Thanks largely to his efforts of a century ago, Hebrew is a vibrant language in Israel – and now on the Internet.

As Yom Ha'atzmaut approaches, I am going to devote the next weeks to looking at Hebrew on the Internet: how to learn Hebrew online, where to play the best Hebrew games and how to make your browser Hebrew-friendly.

But first back to Eliezer Ben-Yehuda. In a marvelous essay, Jack Fellman a senior lecturer at Bar-Ilan University, explains how Ben-Yehuda believed that Jews "must return to their land and begin anew to speak their own language" [www.us-israel.org/jsource/biography/ ben_yehuda.html]. He and his wife Deborah promised to raise their son Ittamar as the first all Hebrew-speaking child in modern history. Ben-Yeduda felt so passionately about protecting his son from other languages that "when visitors came to the house who did not know Hebrew, Ben-Yehuda would send him to bed so that he would not hear their foreign languages." Thanks to Ben-Yehuda's zeal and Ittamar's needs, Ben-Yehuda coined words for such objects as dolls, ice cream, jelly, towel, bicycle and hundreds more to help Hebrew become a vibrant language. "Before Ben-Yehuda... Jews could speak Hebrew; after him they did."

Nowadays, much of Ben-Yehuda's legacy is entrusted to Israel's Academy of the Hebrew Language [hebrew-academy.huji.ac.il/english.html]. For almost half a century, the academy and its linguists, scholars, poets and translators have been debating the language and ruling on its grammar and usage. The academy's decisions are binding on all government agencies including the Israel Broadcasting Authority. Rather than allowing foreign words to take over the language, the academy is constantly creating new Hebrew words. For example, a logo is a samlil, an alien is a chai'zar, while a sitcom is a comediat matzavim.

No Web site on the rebirth of Hebrew would be complete without a photo of Eliezer Ben-Yehuda's library [hebrew-academy.huji.ac.il/benye.html].

On the other side of the Atlantic, the New York-based National Center for the Hebrew Language works to build unity among Jews through Hebrew [www.ivrit.org/]. "Ivrit is the one element shared by every religious denomination, every political grouping, every social organization and every cultural undertaking of Jews." This is a wonderful Web site full of resources for lovers of Hebrew, such as an ulpan directory if you want to spend some time in Israel, a literary corner, a Hebrew marketplace where you can read about the latest Hebrew software, and my favourite, a section called Words and Roots. These witty essays trace a Hebrew word or phrase to its origins. Did you know that if you sneeze in Tel Aviv, you may be wished "Assuta!" (Aramaic for "health!")? Find out why you may be wished "Hadassah!" if you sneeze in Jerusalem [www.ivrit.org/words_roots/words_roots.html].

There are many sites that track the evolution of Hebrew from ancient times to the present. One of the most concise is World of Hebrew and Jewish Languages by Tsuguya Sasaki [www2.gol.com/users/tsuguya/world_h-j.html].

But even more intriguing is Professor Sasaki's autobiographical essay Fascinated by Jewish Languages, in which he explains how Hebrew and Yiddish became so important to an introspective boy born in a little village in northern Japan. Intrigued by language, Sasaki learned several languages, but his interest in Hebrew was so strong that he eventually moved to Jerusalem and was later awarded his doctorate in the Hebrew language. "Coming back to Japan after five years felt quite bizarre. Only then did I notice what a strong influence Hebrew and Yiddish had had upon me. Now I no longer know to which side I belong... Maybe it was all bashert, who knows," Sasaki writes.

Why 'Religion' disappoints

Why Religion Matters*, by Huston Smith, Harpers/San Francisco, $37.95.

Huston Smith, eminent senior scholar and internationally renowned as one of the foremost teachers of comparative religion, is not against the methods or benefits of science. What he does decry, however, is "scientism," the worship of an all-encompassing scientific cosmology which is unable to satisfy the universal hunger for meaning or spirit that men and women crave.

Religion, argues the author, deals basically with the very thing that doesn't concern science – the ends or the purpose of all life and nature. Its interests are with desires, feelings and will. It does not answer the question, "What is it?" but, "Why am I?" It is also charged with the responsibility of finding an answer to the question, "Why am I living?" Without a meaningful answer to that question, there may be length of days but not life itself. To live is to have a purpose, a direction toward a goal. To live is to grow.

Religious questions are totally alien to the scientist in his laboratory. Why is there a universe at all? Is it only a collection of atoms without any purpose, goal or significance? Is a human being, a thing among things, no different from a flint or a bedbug? If he or she is only that, then what is love, or ideals or hope? Is it all a matter of hormones and the manipulation of the endocrinologist? Is there any room for friendship, or for trust in the world of chemistry of physics, of biology?

Human beings must have more than food, clothing and shelter, the author says. They need music, painting, sculpture, poetry and all those experiences which feed the mind and spirit. Whatever else science can do to satisfy men and women, it cannot answer their hunger for beauty, love, hope and faith in ideals.

In a series of concise paragraphs, Smith outlines what he considers to be deficiencies in the thinking of such icons of modernity as Darwin, Marx, Nietzche and Freud – all of whom would relegate religion to the dustbin of history. Smith finds meaning in John Updike's conclusion, "If this physical world is all, then it is a closed hell in which we are confined like prisoners in chains, condemned to watch the other prisoners being slain."

Why Religion Matters is not easily or quickly read. Its major themes aren't new, although they are given extended creative and innovative form. Smith draws on the doctrines and tenets of a variety of religions, as well as on his own long experience as a teacher to expound and amplify his views. Too often, however, the line between science and scientism is blurred and unclear.

Ultimately, what is disappointing about Why Religion Matters is that despite its intellectual vigour and moral passion, it never fully or satisfactorily comes to terms with the question posed by the book's title.

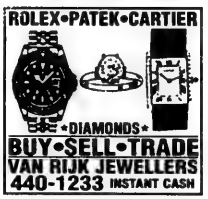
Program for young Jewish leaders being offered

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — It's almost a year since Marnie Silver went to Israel for an intensive, three-week program for young Jewish leaders, and she admits the lectures she heard there are now "a blur."



But what has stayed with the 30-year-old accountant is the "overall experience. I would jump at the chance to do it again," she said.

The program in which she participated, the Young Jewish Leadership Diplomatic Seminar, is organized by Israel's Ministry of Foreign Affairs, under the auspices of its Bayit Meshutaf (Shared Home) division. Room and board, excursions and other expenses, excluding air fare, are covered.

This year, its fifth, the seminar will run from July 15 to August 3. Participants must be university graduates and no older than 35.

Last summer, Silver was one of three Canadian participants, along with Montrealers Emmanuel Castiel, a law student, and Eta Yudin, communications and research officer for Canadian Jewish Congress, Quebec region.

Their counterparts among the 30 young leaders from around the world, came from places such as Argentina, Brazil, Chile, Colombia, Denmark, England, Estonia, India, Italy, Russia, Switzerland, the United States, and Yugoslavia.

"It was really diverse, and that's what made it so great," said Silver. "Because of e-mail it's been so easy to stay in touch."

An active volunteer in B'nai Brith Canada's Institute of International Affairs and a former leader on the organization's Holocaust and Hope program, Silver also volunteers in the general community as president of the board of Eva's Initiative, which operates three shelters for homeless youth.

She recalls wondering what expectations would be placed on her by organizers, and was surprised to learn that aliyah was not one of them. "I left with the impression that [Israel is] thriving, but they need us to be strong and supportive around the world."

She was told that the program is "really to strengthen the ties between the future leaders of the Jewish community around the world, to give them an opportunity to share ideas and experiences so hopefully we'd want to come back and stay involved in our communities," she said.

The program's foremost goal, according to a press release, is to enhance the relationship between young Jewish leaders from all over the world and the State of Israel. Issues explored include the peace process, national security, economy, culture and society and Jewish life in Israel.

Although she had visited Israel three times previously, "this was very intense," Silver said. "It was almost like a crash course on Israel and its relations with other countries. There was a lot of discussion of Israel in terms of separating state and religion...and on the peace process' current status."

Looking back, she feels it was one of the best experiences of her life. "It was a fantastic opportunity to get to meet other Jewish people my age."

Since the program, participants have continued to share ideas – a young leader from India sought input for a speech, for example."

"It's really created such a network, and made the world seem so much smaller," said Silver.

Application forms are available online at www.mfa.gov.il, and – for applicants from Ontario and Western Canada – should be presented to the Consulate General of Israel in Toronto no later than May 1. Applicants in Quebec and Eastern Canada should call the Israeli consulate in Montreal at 514-940-8500.

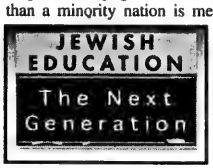
Never forget, always remember

By GILA ASHTOR

We are small but we are many
We are young but we unite,
To the candle of continuity
You are the flame, and we're the light.

Those who fail to learn their history are doomed to repeat it. For Jews everywhere, the burden of remembrance is a heavy one, carrying with it a historical catalog of more pogroms, exiles, and crusades than a minority nation is meant to endure.



Today marks the 56th anniversary of the Holocaust, and as we continue to mourn the catastrophe of systemic Anti-Semitism, so must we question the significance of the Shoah, and the role it plays in our lives.

As youth members of Toronto's Jewish community, the value of Yom Hashoah grows exponentially as we do, a constant reminder of how important the Shoah is to us, and we are to the Shoah. The older we become, the heavier the baggage of remembrance seems to hang on our shoulders. Elie Wiesel once wrote, "Not to forget, not to allow oblivion to defeat memory: that is the obsession."

We are growing up in a world without the survivors we once had, without the witnesses we once knew. While we may manage to comprehend the logistics of mass murder on an intellectual level, we fail to grasp the concept of collective hatred, evil and destruction. Until we walk through the memories of our grandparents and relatives, we are watching disaster from too far a distance to honour its value.

As young carriers of the Jewish past, we cannot forsake the meanings and messages of our heritage. We cannot allow laziness and indifference to finish what mass hatred began only half a century ago. We cannot ignore the modern manifestations of anti-Semitism, whether it surfaces in movies, papers or books, or whether it reveals itself in lyrics, television sitcoms or plays. We cannot release the duty to remember and we cannot be released from the pains of remembrance. It is one thing to never "forget," but it is another to always "remember." We must be excused from neither and observant of both.

As we commemorate the Holocaust, let it be in the spirit of respectful sadness and passionate connection. Let us cry, not because we feel compelled to, but because every murdered soul is seeking our attention, because every Jewish child is looking for our help, because every individual person is dependent on our claims.

The price of remembrance has always been high and always will be. But as we continue to grow and to affect the world around us, we must realize that the price of ignorance is even higher. We are a small but powerful people and we cannot afford to forfeit our stories, our legacies, our memories.

In order to escape the destiny of historical repetition, we must unite in our efforts to learn where we came from, and decide where we are going. We are young and open-minded, and if the Jewish nation has a story to tell, there is no better audience than our own eyes and ears, minds and souls.

Anyone who wishes to attend this year's Yom Hashoah presentation at CHAT is welcome to do so, at Beth Emeth Synagogue, 9:30 a.m., Thurs. April 19.

Feel free to contact me at isgila@home.com.

Island Yacht Club celebrates its 50th anniversary

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — With its club house, tennis courts, swimming pool and marina, the Island Yacht Club (IYC) exudes permanence, stature and prestige. It's hard to imagine that half a century ago, there was not much more than scrub bush and sand where today's impressive facilities stand.

Back then, the financially-strapped club was a real hands-on project for its 12 charter members, who were called upon to lay the foundations of the club by doing the heavy lifting themselves. The yacht club chalutzim operated a bulldozer, cleared the land and erected (with a carpenter's help) a prefab clubhouse that was not much more than walls, ceiling, floor and foundation. It was simple, no doubt, but it was someplace they could call their own at a time when gentile sailing clubs closed their doors to Jewish members.

This summer, the IYC will celebrate its 50th anniversary with numerous events to recognize its auspicious origins.

The official festivities kick off on the weekend of June 1-3 with a barbecue, children's programs, a sail past and a commodore's ball. On July 12, the Rochester Yacht club will honour the IYC with a sail past of about 40 boats while on June 24, the club will host an open house for members of the Bloor Jewish Community Centre, with which the club has struck up a working arrangement.

On July 21, former IYC members will gather for a 50th reunion party "to celebrate a unique club that answered the call when there was discrimination," said Elaine Lev, the IYC's current commodore. "We'd like old members to come and celebrate with us and rejoin."

For many of the old time members, the new club is not exactly the club they once knew.

Where once the IYC featured an elegant sheen that was marked by black tie affairs and twice-weekly dinners and dances, today's club is more casual. Where in the 1960s and '70s, the IYC was a racing club that developed champion sailors, today's member is more apt to be a recreational cruiser, visiting the lake's marinas and clubs at a leisurely pace.

The club is trying to shed its image – shared by other yacht clubs – of exclusivity and remoteness.

The IYC is "reaching out to the community," Lev explained. "It is oriented to the family, with children's programming and charity events."

The Bloor JCC will hold its sports day camp at the IYC facilities, while the club will sponsor a family fun day in support of the Starlight Foundation on June 9. In the first week of July, the club's junior sailing program shoves off, with instruction geared to seven to 16-year-olds.

"It's an interesting focus," Lev said. "The club has gone out to the community, as we should.

"We have a beautiful club on a beautiful island and we feel it's time to give back to the community."

Still, boating remains the IYC's raison d'etre. Currently, a little more than 200 families are club members and the club's slips can accommodate about 170 boats. Most are small – in the 18 to 22-foot range – but the club boasts a 42-foot sailboat as well as a 53-foot cruiser.

Its dining room can accommodate 150 and social events are still a major attraction for members.

The club has also turned the corner in its balance sheet. "Financially, we're solvent and we're in a mode to refurbish the club," Lev said.

Like any recreational facility, the IYC has learned it must compete for the public's entertainment dollar. It no longer has a lock on its members' discretionary incomes, and over the last 10-15 years, some have departed for other recreational pursuits, like golf and cottage life.

In the early days, recalls John Bussin, the club touched a nerve in the Jewish community. Bussin, one of the original IYC members, recalls how the club quickly expanded its membership base as it recruited social members, giving it the critical mass to ensure it would survive. Within a few years, the club grew from 12 to 200 members. It increased its land from three to seven acres and the original, prefab hut was replaced with a more permanent structure.

Club members made their mark on the lake as well, said Bussin, who at 88 is still an active sailor. In the 1950s, IYC members began to win their share of local races and by 1960, two sailors, Mel Gould and Jerry Conway, were chosen to the Canadian Olympic team.

In the mid-1960s, Bussin, aided by his sons Bruce and David, won the Barrows Trophy. Ivan Levine raced for Canada in the Pan Am Games and the IYC developed many sailors who represented Canada at the Maccabiah Games in Israel.

Hartley Robins, who has been a member since 1956, said IYC sailors developed a solid reputation sailing boats in the 5.5-metre, Olympic class. In the 1960s and '70s, as many as 40 IYC boats took part in weekend races.

Today, however, the trend has been to move from racing to more leisurely activities.

"People are more interested in cruising than in racing," Robins, a former IYC commodore, said. "It takes a lot of time to race every week. People are buying bigger boats and cruising more."

The boats in the club's marina have gotten bigger and the social aspect of cruising appeals to club members, Robins said.

Some members have gone on holiday together, cruising the Greek islands on a chartered boat.

"Once you're in boating, it's a way of life," Robins said.

WHAT IS THE CANADIAN SOCIETY FOR THE WEIZMANN INSTITUTE OF SCIENCE?

In the Fall of 1966, the Canadian Society for the Weizmann Institute of Science was formed. The Canadian Society has played a leading role in marshaling Canadian support for the Weizmann Institute in Rehovot, Israel.

Through the Canadian Society, Canadians have played a decisive role in the Institute's progress. There are innumerable research scholarships, bursaries, and a myriad of endowment grants funding various aspects of basic and applied research. Funds raised are used to build and maintain scientific facilities; acquire costly up-to-date research equipment and instrumentation; set up endowments for research centres; establish professional chairs and scholarships.

"The Canadian presence at the Institute has long been strong and vivid, finding expression in a literally dazzling array of such activities and projects as the Canada Centre for Nuclear Physics and its magnificent Koffler Tower, the Canadian Institute for the Energies and Applied Research, a host of professional chairs all endowed by Canadians, tens of laboratories, scholarships, bursaries and a thriving student loan fund. But, most meaningfully, it is expressed in the warm personal relationships formed between Institute scientists and the ranking members of the Canadian Society"...
- Michael Sela, Past President and Deputy Chairman of the Institute's Board of Governors

ORT Canada brings programs to...Canada?

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — ORT Canada, which has traditionally supported educational and technological training in developing countries, is now running a computer study program right here in Toronto.

The 15-week program, now in its second year, is designed for youngsters in grades 6 and 7 who are referred by one of three United Way-related agencies: COSTI, which helps families on welfare and recent immigrants; Jewish Immigrant Aid Service (JIAS); or Jewish Family & Child Service. A parallel program just opened in Edmonton.

The original program came about after the 1999 Toronto Report Card on Children revealed that 37 percent of all children under age 12 in Toronto live in poverty.

The multi-cultural group of 40 students a year (20 per session) are matched up with teenage or young adult mentors, who meet with them one evening a week in a utilitarian room at Jewish Vocational Services (also affiliated with United Way) for a structured computer lesson by a JVS teacher. At the end of the 15 weeks, each student is given a donated computer (or a computer paid for with donations) to take home and keep.

The program includes dinner, and shuttle service for the younger students, some of whom live downtown or in East York. "We have a lot more kids than we can take in," said Joel Shapiro, executive director of Toronto ORT.

"We try to make [the program] not only interesting and creative, but interactive and demonstrative," said Shapiro. "There's as much learning potential for the mentors as for the kids."

There is, in fact, a specific curriculum for the mentors, developed by ORT's mentoring co-ordinator Ruby Kreindler, a social worker by training. Among the issues that are dealt with are what to do about lack of attention, and sensitivity training regarding religious, economic and cultural differences.

"You need to make the mentors aware that a young girl may have been socialized not to talk unless spoken to, and to encourage her to talk," offered Kreindler as an example.

Program co-ordinator Bryon White likes to call the male mentors "Yoda's," in reference to Luke Skywalker's mentor in the movie Star Wars, and the females "Glinda's," like Dorothy's Good Witch in The Wizard of Oz. "This gives [the mentors] a sense of their role in the lives, and journey, of the kids they are helping," he said.

"It's a lot of fun," said Marci Ullman, 17, who became a mentor because she wanted to do volunteer work.

Mentoring "makes me feel special," said Dana Valin, 17, a student at Westmount Collegiate Institute. "I like working with kids and computers."

Her young student, Natalia, is an 11-year-old native of Russia who immigrated from Israel a year ago. "I like it," she said of the program. "I'm learning new things."

Mentor Oleg Grabman, 15, a Grade 10 student at Newtonbrook Secondary School, arrived in Canada less than two years ago himself, with limited English skills. A native of Ukraine, he translates for his young student if she has difficulty understanding the lesson.

American studies have shown that kids who are mentored are less likely to use drugs and alcohol, and more likely to finish their schooling, said Kreindler.

Computer skills are not a prerequisite for the mentors, who learn along with the younger participants. The "amazing thing about computer study," according to an ORT information sheet, is that it ignites interest in children with both dominant analytical ability and dominant creative ability.

On a recent evening, instructor Edward Adair, himself a native of Nicaragua, and assistant Karif Gentles, a student at DeVry Institute, introduced the students to some of the working parts inside the computers.

Adair, one of a rotating group of teachers, recalls one of his best moments in the program: hearing a student say, "I heard about computers, but I never had a chance to touch one until I came to Canada."

The program is "really a microcosm of a program that could be seen in any country around the world that ORT is running," said Shapiro.

"We're helping some of the people that historically have been helped overseas, and now they came here...we wanted to do this for kids who wouldn't otherwise have an opportunity."

A Christian's tale of life in South Lebanon and Israel

By MIRIAM CHINSKY
Special to The CJN

The following interview took place recently in Toronto where Beverly Timgren was visiting her family. She has since returned to Israel.

Beverly Timgren faces me over a cup of tea, reliving her exit from South Lebanon on May 23, 2000.

"At first, the roads out of the buffer zone seemed almost deserted," she remembers, explaining that in the wake of the Israeli troops' sudden withdrawal from the region, cars, trucks and humanity on foot began to converge, heading desperately for Israel. The route became clogged with abandoned vehicles.

On the road were members of the South Lebanese army who had fought with the Israelis. Among the civilians was Timgren, a Canadian dental hygienist who grew up in North York, thousands of miles from this mass exodus.

Feature

Timgren notes she spent 16 years in South Lebanon, 14 as an administrator, clinical hygienist and fund-raiser for a dental clinic which she founded in the Marjayoun Hospital. On that fateful day, sensing that something was wrong, she stowed a few things in her car and joined the exodus.

"I wasn't able to drive through," she recalls. "I left my car with friends and walked, carrying only the suitcase, some documents and my laptop computer."

At the crowded Fatma Gate, she was permitted to cross the border.

"I learned later that my car had been seized, probably by the Hezbollah."

It was Timgren's upbringing that first brought her to Israel to experience first hand the land of the Bible. She visited twice as a tourist and felt inexorably drawn to return a third time on her own. She saw a need, as a devout Christian, to reach out. "I just wanted to help," she says.

Although she had loved working in schools and clinics as a dental hygienist on staff with the Public Health Department in Toronto, she asked for a leave of absence.

"In 1983, through the International Christian Embassy in Jerusalem, I contacted Dr. Alan Brooke, a British dentist and volunteered to work with him," she says. "He had received a donation of dental equipment and planned to set up a clinic in South Lebanon, but he was called back to England and I was left without any backup."

Beverley Timgren

Rising to the challenge, the slight but steel-willed young woman was determined to make the projected clinic a reality. However, there was a setback when the equipment was confiscated in a factional dispute before she could open the boxes. Fortunately, an American doctor managed to acquire a second contribution.

Timgren extended her leave of absence for another year. Finally, in 1986, she opened a dental clinic in the Marjayoun Hospital, which had originally been operated by the Lebanese government and was virtually abandoned in 1975 because of the civil war.

"I learned conversational Arabic," she says. "I hired two dentists and trained my own staff."

Initially, the South Lebanese, who are Catholic, were wary of her Protestant background. But they came to understand that she was simply there to help and the clinic functioned with goodwill for over 14 years, although there was an incident when a Hezbollah shell hit her apartment.

"I was not hurt and I believe that God protected me," she says.

She declares that Israeli forces were a positive presence rather than an occupation. "They didn't interfere with the daily lives of the people and supported our work," she maintains. "In fact, they rehabilitated the hospital."

But she decries former Israeli prime minister Ehud Barak's order for the abrupt pullout in May, seeing it as "a betrayal of the South Lebanese army which fought with Israel" and exposure of the Jewish communities in the north to clearly escalated danger.

Timgren still assists people in Jerusalem and Tiberias

The Marjayoun dental clinic carries on in the hospital though Timgren's presence there is no longer feasible.

Instead, she remains in Israel, commuting between Jerusalem and Tiberias, to assist the people among whom she lived and worked for so many years. Tiberias is accessible to the majority of the refugees who are currently in northern absorption centres, kibbutzim and moshavim.

Through the International Christian Embassy in Jerusalem, she has been granted funding for a dental clinic which opened in Tiberias on Oct. 18, 2000. She calls it Arazim Dental Clinic after the cedar trees which are native to South Lebanon. One Israeli dentist and a Lebanese assistant join her in tending more than 20 patients a day.

Recently, Timgren came back to North York and while her family would like her to stay in Canada, they understood why she felt compelled to return to those who need her. "My faith tells me that this is what I am meant to do," she says.

Timgren, who counts both Arabs and Jews among her friends, states that there is a pronounced anti-Israel bias throughout much of the world, particularly in media reporting.

"As I have learned to observe and understand the complexity of the whole situation and the deep desire for peace," she said just prior to the Israeli election, "I believe that a change in government is likely. Israel must be strong!"

Why cynicism grows among public

This has not been a very good week for our political leaders. Each, in his or her own way, has further entrenched the growing cynicism with which Canadians view politics and no end seems in sight.

The prime minister has succumbed to the one political frailty he most loathed and the one which he least believed himself vulnerable, "Mulroneyism." This syndrome typically afflicts a political leader with virtually absolute power who increasingly believes himself to be impervious to criticism. Just as smoking and high bad cholesterol are the chief culprits of heart disease, the onset of "Mulroneyism" is closely linked to unbelievable arrogance in one's inherent right to govern and the concomitant assumption that the right to govern has no time limits.

Stockwell Day, the "Great Western Hope", is floundering so badly that the Jet-Ski has been replaced by colour co-ordinated yellow "Floaties." Like a deer frozen in the glare of oncoming headlights, the Opposition Leader still doesn't understand that flip-flops are meant for the wading pool (now that the Jet-Ski is gone) and not public statements about party policy. His vanishing credibility has given all Canadians anxious about the moral character of this government, cause for wrenching despair.

That leaves us with the Three Sopranos – each suffering from a severe case of laryngitis relevantis. Gilles Duceppe, fresh off a dismal coronation of a Parizeau clone as Quebec premier and a subsequent PQ defeat in a byelection is scrambling to convince his caucus colleagues – let alone Quebecers – that the Bloc has a legitimate role to play. The dwindling dollars the BQ has been able to raise invite uncomfortable questions about whether Quebecers are well served by political representation in Ottawa that will never be part of a government or the rewards that come with being part of a government.

Scene in Ottawa

By G.K. SIMCOE

Joe Clark's shrillness in the House has not fooled most Canadians either. According to recent polls, Clark's effort on L'Affaire Grand-Mère is being interpreted more as an attempt to direct media attention to himself than a crusade for truth and justice. It has not translated into a boost for Tory fortunes or a reduction of financial debt; it is inevitable that he will soon garner the appropriate level of media (and public) attention that the leader of the fifth party merits.

Finally, we have poor Alexa 'No I am not Audrey McLaughlin' McDonough. Her futile efforts to keep the discourse in Parliament on some of the real issues of the day have reinforced the perception that the NDP is irrelevant to the political process.

The sad thing about all of this is that by extension, if it has been a bad week for the leaders, it means that it has been a very bad week for the rest of us.

Baton Rouge

Baton Rouge chooses the finest ingredients: crisp lettuces; ripe, ready tomatoes and peppers; the best of the day's catch; hand- selected prime beef. The chefs make dressings from scratch, and grill over fine hickory and aromatic hardwoods; watch them work in the open kitchens. They're finicky; each signature dish must be perfection: baby back ribs, chicken tenders light as air, raved- over dips. At well- spaced tables or tucked into intimate, oversized leather booths, the atmosphere is inviting: greenery and warm brick, burnished mahogany and brass, softly mirrored lamplight. Service is prompt and caring; you'll come back, bringing family and friends.

From there, Rev. Howson and other representatives of Bridges for Peace visited Auschwitz-Birkenau. Coincidentally, a group of Israeli high school students was touring the camp at the same time. To show his solidarity with Jews, Rev. Howson borrowed a yellow star from a teacher-chaperone and draped himself in the Israeli flag, like the Israeli students.

His next stop was in the village of Uzgorod in southwest Ukraine.

"We have a little restaurant there and we put food there for the Jewish people. They're very poor. We've renovated the synagogue and we met four Auschwitz survivors there."

About 300 Jews are left in the town and they come for a hot meal once a day, Rev. Howson said.

Project Hope, a Bridges for Peace feeding program in Eastern Europe, runs a second kitchen in the town of Bergovo. "We have Christian people preparing food for the one remaining synagogue in the city," he said. "Seven thousand Jews from the area died in Auschwitz and just a handful of elderly people are left. We're feeding them right in the synagogue."

While most of the region's frail and elderly Jews have chosen to remain in their communities, many of the younger people are leaving for Israel. Thirty Exobuses help Ukrainian Jews get to air and sea embarkation points from their villages. Most are taken to airports where they board El Al flights to Israel while the "Ebenezer" program charters ships to carry Jews from the port of Odessa to Haifa.

About 300 Jews are left in Uzgorod in southwest Ukraine

Project Ezra, meanwhile, locates Jews in remote areas and helps them obtain passports and visas while providing clothing for the trip to Israel. Yet another program sends food to Israel – 47,000 lbs. of grains and lentils in the most recent shipment – to support 70 Jewish and Christian social welfare agencies in Israel.

In 1999, Rev. Howson raised $68,000 US for the programs.

His pitch to supporters is simple: "I tell them that God is calling the Jewish people back to the land of Israel in fulfillment of Bible prophecy and we should help them.

"I tell the Jewish community in Winnipeg that evangelicals and Bible-believing Christians are the best friends Israel has. They believe Jews have a right to the land, that God has an everlasting covenant with the Jewish people...and many are willing to put their money where their mouths are to make it happen."

'Non-political' pro-Israeli statement gains steam

After consulting with them as well as with rabbis and other members of the community, Ben Brith rejected the idea of placing a "counter" ad since it was felt that it would only serve the interests of those who are pro-Palestinian.

Instead, he came up with a statement that has resonated with many in the Jewish community. By March 10, only three days after the anti-Zionist ad appeared, 400 members of the Israeli community had signed it.

The statement, called Am Israel Chai, is written in Hebrew, English and French

The statement, called Am Israel Chai and written in Hebrew, English and French, reads: "We, the members of the Jewish community of Montreal, representing a linguistic, cultural and religious mosaic, stand together as one to proudly proclaim our heartfelt support for the people of Israel, our unequivocal solidarity with the State of Israel, and our deepest hopes for a lasting peace in our time and in the future."

It concludes with the phrase, Am Echad – Lev Achad (One People – One Heart).

The statement has been officially endorsed by the Canadian Jewish Congress, Quebec region (CJC-Q).

"This is a non-political statement that the vast majority of members of the Jewish community could endorse," says Dorothy Zalcman Howard, outgoing president of CJC-Q.

CJC-Q also plans to bring it to the attention of Jews in Ottawa and Toronto, Ben Brith says.

The statement has been made available for signing at Israel Day at Cavendish Mall, the Hillel Jewish Students Centre, Jewish high schools, and synagogues, with the next major venue for circulation at the community Yom Ha'atzmaut celebration.

"Even [Israeli consul general] Shlomo Avital signed it," Ben Brith says.

When all signatures are collected, he adds, it will be forwarded to Moshe Katzav, the president of Israel.

VOLUNTEER PROGRAMS: Cam Jackson, minister of citizenship with responsibility for seniors, cuts a cake celebrating the International Year of Volunteers at Baycrest Centre. With him is Dina Zbar, who is 101 and Baycrest's oldest volunteer. The minister chose Baycrest as the site to announce the province's new volunteer initiatives.

FAREWELL MY FRIEND: Baycrest Terrace resident Rachel Orlan gets a kiss on both cheeks from her young friends Hayley (left) and Marcii. The 10-year-olds from Ventura Park Public School attended a farewell luncheon to exchange gifts and share pizza with their elder "buddies" at Baycrest Centre. A group of grade 5 and 6 students have met on occasions this school year with Baycrest seniors as part of an intergenerational program.

Waterloo Federation of Students gets new president

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Yaacov Iland may be graduating and taking on a full-time job, but he's not leaving the University of Waterloo.

The 22-year-old math major has been elected president of the university's Federation of Students for the year beginning May 1. He is one of four executive members.

Yaacov Iland

"My job is to represent the students," said Iland in a phone interview, explaining that his role is mostly an advisory one. Waterloo has 18,000 full-time undergraduates, although they are not all there at one time, because of the university's co-op programs.

The fact that Iland is Jewish became an issue after a February e-mail was sent by a student to the mailing list of the Muslim Students' Association (MSA) urging recipients to vote as a bloc for candidates who would support their exhibits.

"If the wrong person wins," wrote Nahar Fityani, "it will damage our efforts to raise awareness of our oppressed brothers and sisters around the world."

The letter didn't say anything about him per se, Iland noted, but he told The CJN he did clarify his position in a public forum.

"They're allowed to vote for whoever they want," he said, adding that he has not gone public about his political views, but he would only censor material if it was "illegal."

The Federation of Students oversees student clubs, Iland explained, and "there was some concern [on the part of the MSA] that because I am a Jew and I wear a kippah, I would try to censor exhibits [which are supposed to be identified with student clubs]."

Iland said he has not experienced any anti-Semitism at Waterloo, and "certainly not by the MSA."

There are some hate groups that have attempted to become more active, he said, but "there's not a very receptive attitude to them on campus."

Iland, a native of Sault Ste. Marie, Ont., which has about 50 Jewish families, has attended Jewish Students' Association events "on a semi-regular basis" as a Waterloo student. He would not describe himself as observant, but has worn a kippah since first attending Camp Ramah about a dozen years ago.

Among the issues Iland has taken an interest in over the past four years are the effects on students of the rising costs of tuition and student housing.

"The cost of student housing has increased about 25 percent over the past two years, he noted. "I want to work to change the bursary structure, and make more money available. Thirty percent of every tuition increase must go to student bursaries," he explained. "It is not as accessible as it could be."

The money is mostly reserved for first-year students, he said. "It's important for upper-year students, who are also paying into that, to see the benefits."

He would also like to see the university's scholarship structure become less academically focused and more need-focused, he said.

And it's not too early to be thinking about what will happen when the so-called double cohort year (those currently in Grade 10) reaches university in 2003 along with students now in Grade 11, when the OAC year is eliminated.

"We will be lobbying the provincial government to give the university information on what kind of funding they can expect. They can't budget yet, because they don't know how much they'll be getting."

Iland is also thinking about the need to examine issues related to on-campus bars, to accommodate future first-year students who will be under the legal drinking age of 19.

Although he's very interested in public policy, Iland said, he doesn't think his foray into student government will lead to a career in politics.

Israeli planes hit Syrian radar station in Lebanon

Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — Israeli leaders sent warnings to Syria on Monday to curb the activity of Hezbollah guerrillas after Israel Air Force warplanes destroyed a Syrian radar station deep in Lebanon at 1 a.m., killing three Syrian soldiers and wounding at least six.

The attack was in retaliation for the killing of an Israeli soldier who died Saturday when Hezbollah guerrillas fired missiles from inside Lebanon at an Israeli tank in the Har Dov area.

The air force raid was the first such attack on Syrian targets in years and represented a marked departure from recent Israeli reprisal attacks, which have been limited to Hezbollah targets and have gone no deeper than one kilometre from the border, since IDF troops last May pulled out of the "security zone" – a buffer strip along the border that Israel had held since the mid-'80s.

Defence Minister Benjamin Ben-Eliezer said Israel had conducted a "policy of restraint in order to prevent escalation," but added that in the face of continuing Hezbollah attacks, the government had decided to launch a retaliatory strike.

The "rules of the game in Lebanon" had changed, Ben-Eliezer said, and Israel would not reconcile itself to attacks on its soldiers and civilians, and "holds Syria responsible for these actions."

IDF chief spokesperson Brig.-Gen. Ron Kitri left little room for conjecture about the message Israel was sending: "Perhaps the only new element is the clear link that the army defined in the attack last night between a completely Syrian target, and the message... to Syria and through it to Hezbollah, in clear language that leaves no room for doubts: Enough! No farther!"

Kitri said the raid demonstrated that Israel's patience was running out. "The signal is clear and I very much hope that it will be understood by decision-makers in Syria and in Hezbollah," he said.

Monday's strike was the first against a Syrian position in Lebanon since April 1996, when one Syrian soldier was killed and seven others seriously wounded in a raid on an air defence position in Beirut.

The decision to strike at a Syrian target was taken at an emergency session of Prime Minister Ariel Sharon's security cabinet Sunday night. Of the 11 participants, only Labour cabinet ministers Shimon Peres and Ephraim Sneh cast dissenting votes.

'We warned the Syrians over and over'

Following the attack, however, Sneh backed the decision, saying, "We warned the Syrians over and over, in many channels... they need to know the price for not listening to us."

The isolation of Peres underscored the polar differences in policy outlook between Sharon and his foreign minister. But the normally high-profile Peres appeared to steer clear of the airwaves Monday, reserving his public duties to a meeting with his Jordanian counterpart Abd al-Illa al-Hatib, who himself condemned the air strike before travelling to Israel for the first official visit by a leading Arab diplomat since Sharon took office.

Ra'anan Gissin, a senior aide to Sharon, said of the air assault, "There is a new 'price list,' which certainly points out to the Syrians that there is a need for them, for Hezbollah and for the Palestinians as well, to make a new reassessment regarding Israel's readiness, willingness, and determination to react."

Issuing a counter-warning on widening the conflict, Lebanese Prime Minister Rafik Hariri denounced the raid – 35 kilometres east of Beirut – as "a grave aggression on Lebanon and Syria."

Hariri called on the international community "to act swiftly to contain the repercussions of such tension, which could take dangerous dimensions."

The Palestinian Authority also attacked the raid as a "dangerous escalation."

Less restrained was the response of Israeli Arab MK Abdulmalik Dehamshe (United Arab List), who branded the air force attack an act of terrorism and sent a telegram of condolence to Syrian President Bashar Assad over the deaths of the three soldiers.

Dehamshe's response evoked charges from some Israelis that he was head of an Israeli "fifth column." Leftist opposition leader Yossi Sarid said Dehamshe's reaction was "perverse" in that the Israeli Arab MK, a leader of Israel's Islamic movement, had sent no similar telegram marking the death of Israeli soldier Elad Litvak, killed in the Hezbollah attack.

"This is yet another mistake made by Arab lawmakers, when they line up and express sympathy for only one side; this is a serious mistake, and not a worthy custom of civilized people," Sarid said.

Yossi Beilin, the dovish former cabinet minister who spearheaded a campaign demanding that the IDF withdraw from Lebanon, had no qualms about the overnight strike, for which he said, "Israel certainly has full justification."

Beilin said Israel's strict adherence to a withdrawal behind a UN-determined border – rejected by Hezbollah leaders as excluding Lebanon-claimed land near the Har Dov site of the Saturday attack – meant that Syria "must pay the price if Israel is hurt."

Referring to a silence over the Israeli raid in state-controlled Syrian news media, Beilin added that he believes "Syria will understand the message, and I think the fact that [the raid] has still not been broadcast there is not a coincidence."

Lebanese leader's paper criticizes Hezbollah attack

By DANIEL SOBELMAN
Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — On Sunday, the Lebanese daily al-Mustakbal, harshly criticized Hezbollah for its Saturday attack on an Israel Defence Forces position on Mount Dov that left one Israeli soldier dead.

The newspaper is owned by Lebanese President Rafik Hariri and serves as a mouthpiece for his views.

In an analysis piece, presented as the lead story in the newspaper, the editor of al-Mustakbal criticized the timing of the Shi'ite organization's operation and even hinted that the government in Beirut could not let the incident slip by without responding to it.

Under the headline, Shaba Farm: The failed timing operation, the editor questions why Hezbollah chose to act now.

"Was the decision to carry out this operation a wise decision and does its timing suit the supreme interests of Lebanon?" he asks.

The editor also wonders whether Lebanon, under the current circumstances, can bear "the political, economic and social ramifications of such an operation."

The article notes that these are, "candid and perhaps impolite questions stemming from supreme national interests. They demand candid, clear and urgent answers that will suit the sensitive position in which Lebanon and the region currently find themselves."

According to the writer, "Eleven months have passed since the clear victory achieved by Lebanon, primarily due to resistance, and secondly thanks to the firm stance of the nation and official support...If this victory belongs to all the Lebanese, then its reinforcement and preservation must also be borne by all the people of Lebanon. No single group should be allowed to decide on any measure that is likely to stain this victory, undermine it or dismantle the consensus that created it."

Israeli rockets on Chinese plane

By AMNON BARZILAI
Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM —Chinese F-8 fighter planes like the one that crashed with an American reconnaissance aircraft on April 1, carry Israeli-made Python 3 missiles, a photograph of the plane in question has revealed.

The photograph, taken in January and clearly depicting the air-to-air missiles manufactured by Israel's Rafael Armament Development Authority, appeared on films released recently by U.S. Defence Secretary Donald Rumsfeld.

Officials in Israel's security establishment have expressed concern in recent days that the showdown between China and the United States is liable to deliver a mortal blow to deals prepared between Israel and China involving the sale of weapons and sophisticated electronic security systems.

The video clip shows the Chinese plane during an air maneuver conducted in January over the South China Sea, providing no indication of whether the F-8 was carrying the Python missiles when it crashed with the American EP-3 surveillance plane at the start of April.

Python 3 missiles were sold secretly by Israel to China during the 1980s, before diplomatic relations between the two countries were formally established.

At the time of the transaction, Python 3 missiles were considered highly advanced; Israeli governments and Rafael refused to acknowledge the sale of the missiles to China.

Omri Sharon meets with Arafat again

general of the Foreign Ministry Eitan Bentsur, and Ariel Sharon's attorney, Dov Weisglass, who is considered the leading candidate to become attorney general.

If Omri Sharon's meetings with Arafat aim to convince the Palestinian leader to bring an end to violence so that negotiations can begin, they do not seem to have had the desired effect. Mortar attacks from the Gaza Strip against military and civilian targets have not stopped. In the last few days, these attacks have eased somewhat, but instead, the Palestinians have been using more rifle-fired grenades, probably manufactured in Gaza.

Israeli intelligence is certain that PA officials are involved in the mortar attacks.

Syrian seat on Security Council vexes Israel

By ALUF BENN
Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

Comment

Foreign policy mandarins in both the Foreign Ministry and the Prime Minister's Office (PMO) are divided over what to do about Syria's application, and near certain acceptance, as the Asia bloc representative on the UN Security Council for the next two years.

One school of thought says Israel should be objecting to Damascus getting such an important role in the world body, even though the issue seems very much a fait accompli since Syria is seen to have the votes needed to win the coveted seat.

The other school of thought says that precisely because Syria's accession to the role is a forgone conclusion, Israel should not waste its diplomatic ammunition on the cause.

"The Syrian [peace] option is dead," a source in the PMO said this week, noting that Syrian President Bashar Assad has become a vehement supporter of the Palestinian intifadah, and has routinely attacked Israel with particularly vituperative rhetoric, most recently at the March summit of the Arab League in Amman.

Prime Minister Ariel Sharon has rarely commented publicly on Syria since taking office, though he did spend some of his time with President George Bush in the White House last month discussing Damascus. Sharon told Bush that Syria's support of the most radical anti-peace elements in the Middle East, including support for Hezbollah in Lebanon, and its hosting of rejectionist groups in Damascus, should keep it on the U.S. list of countries that support terrorism.

Indeed, it is Syria's occupation of Lebanon, combined with its support for various terrorist organizations in that country and on its own soil, that could serve as the focal point of an Israeli diplomatic campaign against allowing Syria to occupy a seat on the Security Council. The UN's mandate for council membership specifically states that the seats are reserved for countries that support peace-making efforts in their region.

But the policy advisors opposed to fighting what they see as the inevitability of a Syrian Security Council seat, argue about the potential results of such a diplomatic campaign. Since Israel will be unable to prevent Syria from gaining the two-year term on the council, it would be a wasted diplomatic effort to fight the vote, they say.

Some sources in the PMO's office agree, saying that Israel could even benefit from having Syria on the council, at the very least using the fact that an enemy country has such an important role at the UN as proof that the body is hostile to Israel.

If there is a decision to fight the vote, the main target in Israel's campaign will be Washington. Syria is one of the countries on Washington's list of states that support terrorism. Israeli diplomats will ask how an American ambassador to the UN can vote in favour of letting Syria onto the council. On the other hand, Washington wants to draw Syria into the anti-Iraq coalition. Like Israel, Washington also hasn't made up its mind what to do about the Syrian candidacy.

Some 35 Palestinians, including 11 children and two women, were injured.

Chief rabbi, PA sheikh meet in Jerusalem

By YAIR SHELEG
Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — Sheikh Talal Sider, the only Palestinian cabinet minister who is also a religious Muslim, met last week with Chief Rabbi Eliyahu Bakshi-Doron.

Joining the two at the meeting in the rabbi's home in Jerusalem were Deputy Foreign Minister Rabbi Michael Melchior and Rabbi Menahem Froman from Tekoa. Rabbi Froman initiated the meeting during a recent visit with Yasser Arafat.

Chief Rabbi Eliyahu Bakshi-Doron

Sider conveyed to the chief rabbi, in Arafat's name, best wishes to the Israeli people for the Passover holiday. The meeting took place with the approval of Prime Minister Ariel Sharon, who instructed the Israel Defence Forces to facilitate the sheikh's entry into Israel, in a move running counter to the recent clamp-down on the free movement of Palestinian VIPs.

In a conversation with Ha'aretz, Rabbi Froman said that Arafat did not respond immediately to his suggestion to convene this meeting, other than to say it was an "excellent idea." But several days later, Sheikh Sider called to say that he had received Arafat's okay.

Sheikh Sider told Ha'aretz that the meeting signifies that "we are saying to the people in Israel that we are interested in the path of peace, and not war."

Report: Water crisis worse than predicted

By AMIRAM COHEN
Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — The Water Commission's Hydrology Department is warning that Israel's potable water shortage is worse than originally estimated and that seawater has seeped into the southern coastal aquifer, causing Water Commissioner Shimon Tal to call for "cuts in everything."

A report on the matter was presented recently at a meeting of the committee administering Israel's water resources. Experts cited in the report said the combination of groundwater overpumping in the area and the lack of sufficient rainfall in recent years has caused a shift of the sea waterline towards inland. The penetration of seawater into southern coastal aquifer is already evident in Mekorot's water drilling in the Ashdod area, the report said.

An updated estimate of available potable water for 2001, also presented to the commission, showed Israel has 475 million cubic metres of water less than needed to meet its water requirements. The previous estimate pegged the potable water deficit at only 390 million cubic meters for 2001 – a 20 percent difference. (A cubic metre equals 1,000 litres.)

A key reason for the drastic shortfall is that this past March was the driest month of March in more than 40 years, the report indicated.

The reported water shortage already factors in the cuts that are being implemented in the allocation of water for agricultural purposes in 50 areas.

Water Commissioner Shimon Tal cautioned that even the estimated 475-million-cubic-metre shortfall in potable water for 2001 is subject to change. He added that cuts in water pumping for 2001 are meant to ensure the country's main reservoirs remain balanced, and that no further deterioration in their condition occurs.

"This shortage will force us to make cuts in everything – both in the water lines, and also in consumption," Tal warned.

The Water Commission expressed disappointment that the plan it handed the ministerial committee that met last week to discuss the matter did not win automatic approval. The plan includes several extreme measures to counter the water shortage, including a ban on watering of gardens and lawns for three years, and 10 percent cuts in water use by industry and agriculture.

Mideast story should now change

In his book Battle Lines: The American Media and the Intifada, now a classic treatment of how the media covered the original intifadah, Jim Lederman describes how journalists most often view events through a fixed perceptual framework, referred to simply as "the story."

Of course, there is never "one story," but rather a number of closely-related story lines such as "Israeli David has become Goliath," "the occupation is the cause of ongoing violence," and "the violence is a conflict over land."

Lederman writes: "Well-aged story lines feel good. They go down the throat as smoothly as fine sour mash. They can lull the most skilled journalistic and political practitioners into a kind of trance in which events are automatically slotted into the frame of the story line without considering that the story line may not be appropriate for the events being described."

Lederman's words resound with a thud when reading the Globe and Mail's editorial, "Israel's settlement insult" (April 7). While joining in the United States's criticism of Israeli plans for expanding several settlements, the Globe adds: "Land, it bears repeating, is at the core of the Israeli-Palestinian quarrel."

If, as it appears, by "land" the Globe means the West Bank and Gaza Strip, the paper is wrong. It is wrong not only because Israel had already ceded territory under Oslo, but wrong because that story line can no longer be sustained following Yasser Arafat's rejection last summer of former Israeli prime minister Ehud Barak's offers to give the Palestinians virtually all the remaining territory they have been seeking.

The issue for Arafat and indeed for the entire Arab world, it turns out, is not land, namely, the West Bank and Gaza Strip. Rather, the issue is the Palestinian insistence that Israel must accept their "right of return" to Israel itself, along with their refusal to accept any Jewish historical or religious attachment to any part of Jerusalem, even the Western Wall and the Temple Mount.

In short, the evidence is now overwhelming that the "core" of the conflict is not Israel's "occupation" but Israel's existence as a Jewish state.

Lederman warns of the danger of "entrapment" in an old story line whose relevance has passed. Some journalists risk missing the new actualities as they try to make facts fit the old framework. Israelis who put their faith in a two-state solution, especially those on the left, have painfully had to face a changed reality, a reality that many influential elements of the western media still need to recognize.

Historic debate under way in Germany

By ELIAHU SALPETER
Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

Opinion

There's a historic debate under way in Germany over the concepts of "patriotism" and "national pride." It's impossible, of course, to separate the debate from Germany's Nazi past or from the question of how Germany deals with the groups of neo-Nazis now operating on its soil.

Meanwhile, the Jewish community grows by leaps and bounds, joined by immigrants from the east, making Germany's Jewish community the third largest in Europe and raising the question of whether normalization is possible between the German state and the Jewish community inside it. And if it is possible, what influence will it have on Germany's special attitude toward Israel?

The subject of "German pride" is taking up a lot of space in the German press nowadays. Sometimes it seems as if the argument is all about semantics. President Johannes Rau says he is "happy and grateful" that he is German, but cannot be "proud" of that fact because "it's not an achievement to be German, just a matter of luck." Chancellor Gerhard Schroeder declares he's "proud of the achievements of the people and its democratic culture," as if to say pride, yes, but not in the German nation, rather in the new German state; not in all of German history, but in postwar federal Germany.

Josef Joffee, the Jewish editor of the influential Die Zeit, explained recently in an essay that "when a German wants to be proud of the federal republic, he doesn't have to go fishing in brown mud," a German expression that Joffee also used to refer to the brownshirts of the Nazi movement. Joffee went on to say that "he can refer to the fact that on German soil, which has known totalitarianism, democracy has struck roots."

On the other hand, a commentator for the Allgemeine Jüdische Wochenzeitung, the weekly published by the association of Jewish communities in Germany, wrote in a more critical tone: "It's not being said that I'm proud to be German, but rather that you have to be proud to be German simply because it [Germany] belongs to us... And those who object, aren't German at all."

German pride and Jewish sensitivity

The main reason for the debate is that third-generation Germans feel neither responsible for nor guilty about Hitler's deeds. Presumably, the headlines of recent years about the demands for compensation for Holocaust victims, and the threats that sometimes accompany those lawsuits, have given many Germans the feeling that the discussion about the Nazi past is now all about money and not morality. And money, as everyone knows, is not holy, and there can be disagreements about it.

But the real roots of the debate seem to be deeper and easier to understand: Most Germans are tired of hundreds of years of their history being reduced to the 12 years of Nazi rule, and especially the five years of Shoah.

Nonetheless the Germans are still being reminded that it's not just history at stake. In February, the German government brought a lawsuit in the constitutional court at Karlsruhe, seeking to ban the National Democratic Party (NDP). That extreme right-wing party has been accused of encouraging crimes of a racial nature and spreading "anti-Semitic views similar to Nazism."

In the last 20 years, the party has not managed to get past the five percent parliamentary electoral threshold, but the prosecutor general's office has brought charges against it for co-operating with skinheads and for advocating violence in the streets.

The trial will probably not take place until next year. Meanwhile, statistics that could have come only from the prosecution's brief having been made public show a rising trend in anti-Semitic crime.

Last year, there were 1,084 incidents reported to the police, nearly twice the number in 1999. The extent to which the increase in the number of incidents instigated by extremist groups reflects mainstream opinion presumably answers the question to what extent German society has rid itself of extreme nationalism. The constitutional court may yet have to provide an answer to that question.

It is therefore not a disaster for the issue of national pride to come up for public discussion in Germany now. But it is unfortunate that all the publicity and discussion in recent years about lawsuits to compensate Shoah victims and their heirs has contributed to a change in German – and for that matter, non-German – perceptions of the Holocaust.

Instead of discussing the Nazis' 50 million victims in World War II and the six million Jews among them, most of the public talk lately is about the hundreds of millions of dollars in compensation and damages.

No nation wants to live indefinitely with the mark of Cain.

The debate over national pride is one of the signs that Germans want to finally be free of the guilt over what their parents and grandparents did. When that aspiration becomes the open wish of all Germans, it could change the nearly unquestioning support Germany gives to Israel and to the rights of Jews worldwide.

The debate about national pride in Germany, therefore, affects not only the Jews of Germany, but also Israel and those Diaspora Jews who care about Israel.

Ali's just a crazy Dame

By BEN ROSE
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — Musician-comedian Alison Joy (Ali) Eisner, was described by a local critic as a "raw and unmistakable" talent, in reference to her work in the comedy revue March of Dames.

Eisner, 27, likes to live and perform downtown. "I have nothing against suburbia [where her parents live], but I used to get downtown any way I could, by subway or by friends giving me a lift," she says.

"Catch the frizzy-haired singer and former YTV host before she hits it huge," advised the same Eye magazine critic in the March of Dames review.

Sometimes, Eisner says, "I do crazy things," as she did in March of Dames March 29.

The daughter of Dr. Paul Eisner, a dentist, and Anne Eisner, an artist, Ali Eisner plays a number of instruments, though she likes the guitar best.

She is named after her grandfather's sister, who was lost in the Holocaust, "along with tons of other relatives. I'm told that I act and look like her," she says.

"My mother tells me that I used to bang pots and pans, because I was so interested in music, when I was little. I grew up on the music of Stevie Wonder, the Beatles and Joni Mitchell, but Stevie Wonder was my favourite.

"I begged my parents to get me a guitar, which they did, and they have been very supportive. I'm the only one in the family in show business. I guess I'm the black sheep."

Her own music is a combination of pop, blues and folk.

Eisner's career got going when she hosted a Saturday morning show for children on YTV between 1995 and 1998, getting the kids interested in making their own instruments.

For YTV, she made personal appearances in Winnipeg, Calgary and Vancouver, among other places, playing her guitar and talking when she felt like it. This led to a job in Los Angeles, hosting a children's show for the Fox network, but she says she was glad to come back to Canada where there were many job offers.

She has made appearances at Lilith Fair at the Ontario Place amphitheatre, and last summer she was the host at a music festival in Dawson City in the Yukon.

Her first gig was at the Free Times Cafe on College Street, where she met a lot of young people. From there, she went to gigs at small bars and cafes downtown.

"I'll play anywhere that I'm welcome."

But, she says, "I don't want to be pushed into any category, like being a comedian."

Although she appeared in a play, Free Lance Lover, at Buddies in Bad Times Theatre, she said she has no ambitions as an actor.

Born in Toronto, Eisner attended Associated Hebrew Schools until Grade 7, and then switched to Zion Heights public school because it offered drama, music and photography. She attended A.Y. Jackson high school and went on to a fine arts program at York University which she left to take a job at YTV.

She recently did a recording for Virgin Records. Her next performances will be at the Rivoli, April 28, and May 4 at Buddies in Bad Times.

Alison Joy (Ali) Eisner has come a long way from banging her mother's pots and pans.

Nazi atrocities in Poland subject of first-rate series

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

Ethnic cleansing came into being long before the phrase was coined during the nationalistic wars in the Balkans in the 1990s.

In fact, ethnic cleansing was Nazi Germany's modus operandi after its 1939 invasion of Poland.

"One can't fight a war with Salvation Army methods," Adolf Hitler is reported to have said by way of deflecting unease about German atrocities there.

Indeed, Poland was a laboratory of German barbarism. Polish Catholics were displaced, deported and subjected to dispossession, while Polish Jews were harassed, ghettoized and murdered.

Germany's beyond-the-pale conduct in Poland is the subject of two disquieting documentaries to be broadcast by TVOntario later this month as part of its first-rate series, The Nazis: A Warning from History.

The Wild East and The Road to Treblinka will be aired on Monday, April 23 and Monday, April 30, respectively, at 10 p.m.

Covering the first 20 months of Germany's occupation of Poland, The Wild East revolves around three Nazi administrators – Arthur Greiser, Albert Forster and Hans Frank – who effectively ruled that downtrodden country.

Although they approached their tasks quite differently, they were in basic agreement about its ultimate objectives: to subjugate or assimilate the local Catholic population and to absorb the conquered territories. As far as Jews were concerned, the goal was unmistakable: to isolate and exterminate them.

The Wild East, augmented by excellent file footage of the period, shows how the Nazis either tried to Germanize or humiliate the Catholics of Poland. To some degree, the methods used depended on who was in charge of the process.

Not surprisingly, the Nazis treated Poles of German ethnicity preferentially, who repaid the favour by collaborating wholeheartedly with the Nazi occupiers.

In highlighting the plight of the Jews, The Wild East focuses on the Lodz ghetto, where, initially, 160,000 people were crammed into a two square mile area.

The point is also made that Polish businessmen of German extraction enriched themselves at the expense of Jews.

The Road to Treblinka, which concentrates on Poland and the Baltic states, particularly Lithuania, is a chilling account of the incremental process that climaxed with the industrial mass murder of Jews.

The Nazi campaign began with random shootings and gassings, climaxing with the organized murder of Jews in killing factories such as Treblinka and Auschwitz.

Animated by the belief that Judaism and Communism were synonymous, Hitler embarked on a crusade to eradicate both.

Four mobile murder squads, so-called Einsatzgruppen directed by Reinhard Heydrich and commanded by highly educated leaders, decimated about one million Jews after Germany's 1941 invasion of the Soviet Union.

It comes as something of a jolt to learn that 80 percent of its foot soldiers in Lithuania, Latvia and Estonia were locals. It appears that the visceral hatred of Jews in the Baltics was rooted, in part at least, in the firm conviction that Jews had co-operated with the Soviet occupation and were thus guilty of high treason.

In a horrific moment, a former member of one of these squads is asked how he feels today about his crime. "You just pull the trigger, he falls, and that's it," he replies.

Although the Einsatzgruppen continued to wreak havoc after the 1942 Wannsee conference, which authorized the systematic murder of European Jewry, the vast majority of Jews after that seminal date were murdered in the death camps of Poland.

These camps were extremely efficient. To this day, a Jewish survivor of Treblinka has trouble comprehending the enormity and scale of the slaughter. Consider this: 99 percent of its hapless inmates perished, and were killed within three hours of their arrival.

Top-ranking Nazis were exceedingly proud of their accomplishments. Heinrich Himmler described the Holocaust as "one of the most glorious chapters in our history."

Israeli film featured at International Kids Film Fest

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — The fourth annual Sprockets Toronto International Film Festival for Children gets under way on April 20 and runs until April 29.

This year's program offers 18 features and 33 shorts in 16 languages from 20 countries, including Israel and Canada.

The Israeli movie, The Other Cheek, in Hebrew with English subtitles, is 15 minutes in length andwritten and directed by Yuval Zafrir.

It's a cheeky, humorous short with a universal message.

An innocent white lie leaves Ronen with a broken leg, his younger sister Maly with a bruised ego and her boyfriend Daniel with a slap and a kiss on the cheeks.

As a result of these chain of events, Ronen and Maly, who are estranged from each other, are reconciled, while Daniel and Maly develop a stronger, quasi-romantic friendship.

The film, set on a farm in Israel, is by turns menacing, suspenseful, cheery and insouciant.

Zafrir, a young and upcoming filmmaker, has what it takes to be a successful director.

From Far Away, a seven-minute National Film Board of Canada animated cartoon, is jointly directed by Shira Avni, an Israeli, and Serene El-Haj Daoud, a Lebanese.

Based on a book by Robert Munsch and Saoussan Askar, From Far Away is about the pangs of displacement, homesickness and adjustment.

Saoussan, a seven-year-old girl from Beirut, leaves Lebanon with her family after the outbreak of the 1975 civil war and moves to Canada with her family.

She misses Beirut, but knows she cannot go home again. Worse still, unable to speak English, she is having a hard time getting used to her school.

Like most immigrants, she gradually adapts to her surroundings and gets on with her new life in Canada.

Though ethnically centred, From Far Away exudes an international appeal.

Sprockets will unreel primarily at the Cineplex Odeon Varsity theatres and the Isabel Bader Theatre.

For further information, call 416-968-FILM. The website address is www.bell.ca./filmfest.

POET, ESSAYIST, TRANSLATOR MIRIAM WADDINGTON HONOURED IN VANCOUVER

The Association for Canadian Jewish Studies (ACJS) honoured one of the luminaries of the Canadian Jewish literary establishment recently at a Vancouver synagogue.

Poet, essayist, Yiddish translator and fiction writer Miriam Waddington, who moved from Toronto to Vancouver about seven years ago, says she was surprised that "so many people" turned up for the award ceremony, which took place at the Beth Israel Synagogue in February.

"I was amazed, because I haven't lived that long in Vancouver," she said. "I can only say that it was a totally wonderful evening."

Organizers had expected about 30 people and optimistically set up the room for 60. Yet more than 120 showed up to hear Richard Menkis, Ruth Panofsky, Seymour Levitan, Hesh Troper and others pay tribute to Waddington, a former professor of English at Toronto's York University.

It was Troper – president of the ACJS and a professor at Toronto's OISE Institute – who had the honour of presenting Waddington with a plaque "in recognition of her outstanding contribution to Canadian literature and scholarship."

Born in Winnipeg in 1917, Miriam Waddington attended that city's Peretz School and became fluent in Yiddish. She attained a BA from the University of Toronto.

She has published many poems and stories. Her Collected Poems was published by the Oxford University Press in 1986. Oxford also published her influential collection of essays, Apartment Seven, in 1989, and an anthology that she edited, Canadian Jewish Short Stories, in 1990. She has received honourary degrees from Lakehead and York universities.

She has also translated many obscure gems from Yiddish into English. "I'm very pleased because the one thing that I've done well in my life is I've translated good things from Yiddish," she said. "Yiddish was my mameloshen. I read it as easily as I read English, so I'm lucky."

Even in supposed retirement, she continues reading in Yiddish and is currently translating items by writers Rachel Korn and J.J. Segal, among others. "It takes a writer to translate another writer," she said. "To be a good translator, you need to have a lot of intuition. I've agonized for three days about how to translate a phrase. Not a lot of people would take the time to do this, because they do it for money. I did it for love."

The tribute to Waddington was organized by Richard Menkis, an associate professor at the University of British Columbia, in conjunction with Gaynor Levin at Beth Israel Synagogue.

"The question was not why are we having this evening in honour of Miriam, but why has it taken us so long to have this evening?" Menkis said.

Documentary examines memories

By JOSEPH SERGE
Arts Editor

How has the Holocaust been presented in different countries over the past five decades?

Director Howard Zuckerman tries to answer this question in his documentary Lingering Memories, airing on PBS (WNED in Buffalo) April 19 at 10:00 p.m.

A wide range of people, from students to academics, to survivors and artists from many different countries describe how the Holocaust was depicted, and at times distorted in education, the media and the arts.

One Israeli says when she was in school, the Holocaust permeated everything, even mathematical formulas.

In West Germany, following the war, history text books seemed to end after World War I. And while present-day Germany has come to terms with its role in the Holocaust, Austria still seems to be in denial.

One survior of a German concentration camp now acts as a tour guide for German school children at the camp.

And while Holocaust art proliferates worldwide in paintings, museums, sculptures and memorials, some artists are using different "counter-art" techniques to get the message across.

Lingering Memories is repeated on WNED on April 26 at 3:00 a.m.

Dentist's tools were his passport to his survival in Auschwitz

By BILL GLADSTONE
Special to The CJN

SS commander Otto Moll had a toothache, and so he visited the dentist of Auschwitz, a Jewish inmate named Berek Jakubowicz. Settling into the chair, he pulled out his revolver and pointed it at the emaciated Jakubowicz. "Don't try anything stupid, dentist," he warned.

"Herr Hauptscharfuhrer," the dentist replied, affecting a nonchalant manner and brushing the pistol aside. "You don't need to be concerned. The pistol is only in our way."

This is one of many horrific and memorable moments in The Dentist of Auschwitz: A Memoir, by Benjamin Jacobs (the former Berek Jakubowicz of Dobra, Poland). His dental tools, which he carried in a bright red box, were his passport to survival.

Sixty years after surviving deportation, enslavement, beatings, hunger and even the capsizing of a ship, Jacobs tells a moving and harrowingly painful tale. To borrow from the common metaphor of dentistry, imagine the pain of an extracted tooth and how it can consume your whole being; now imagine how trivial it seems when put into the context of Auschwitz.

As expected, there is a Wieselian darkness about this book, as when the author describes being forced to commit indignities upon the dead by having to remove the gold teeth from corpses. The amazing thing is that he never seemed to lose faith despite his treatment, and did not lose his sense of the oppressors' humanity.

There is even a brief spring-like romance in the book. Sneaking occasionally out of a labour camp, Jacobs had a love affair in the woods with a young Polish woman, Zosia, a Righteous Gentile who tried to rescue him and his father.

The book is partly an account of cruel deprivations and partly an account of various "miracles" he witnessed. For example, five Nazis led him to a barracks wall to be shot, yet he was spared. ("In spite of my fear, I held my head high like a character in a Shakespearean play.")

Soon after their arrival at Auschwitz, Jacobs was ordered to the right and his father to the left, but a commotion enabled him to pull his father from what would have been certain death.

At Gutenbrunn concentration camp, he commented to some inmates that a passing high-ranking SS official looked Jewish; the comment was overheard and a man with the official "hit me in the face with his gloves shouting, 'Shut your mouth! You swine! Don't you know who this is? He is Sturmbannfuhrer Adolf Eichmann!'"

Eichmann turned to Jacobs and grinned. He opened his briefcase and said, "Look – do you know what those are?"

Jacobs saw rope tied neatly in four nooses. "I couldn't say 'nooses,' for fear that the word would not pass through my lips. I didn't know what to do. Finally I said, 'Herr Sturmbannfuhrer, those are ropes.'

"'No, no. Those are zizith,' he said gleefully, whereupon the whole entourage burst into laughter." (Eichmann was referring in Hebrew to the holy fringes of the Jewish prayer shawl.)

By clandestine means, Jacobs received a letter in the concentration camp from his sister that began: "When you receive this letter, Mama and I will be no longer alive." The letter related that the entire ghetto was about to be departed to Chelmno, from which no one ever returned. His mother wrote a post-script: "Perhaps we'll all meet in another world." But through a remarkable chain of circumstances, he met them again in this world, one last time.

In 1945, Jacobs was part of an intended prisoner transfer to Sweden aboard the ship Cap Arcona which the British torpedoed; he was one of a few hundred, of about 5,000, to survive. He came to the United States after the war and made his home in Boston.

Published by the University Press of Kentucky, The Dentist of Auschwitz sells in Canada for $27.95.

Toronto author wins $10,000 prize

By BILL GLADSTONE
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — A book by a well-known Toronto author won a $10,000 prize for non-fiction last month and is in the running for a second $10,000 prize to be awarded in May.

Erna Paris's sixth book, Long Shadows: Truth, Lies and History, which was published last year by Knopf Canada, was awarded the Pearson Writers' Trust Non-Fiction Prize last month in a ceremony here.

The book has been described as "an exploration of how our world deals, or fails to deal, with the aftermath of great violence, horror, and acts of inhumanity."

The jury's citation described Long Shadows as "a work of philosophical depth and moral courage. It is distinguished by vivid and precise prose, equally successful in sketching subtleties of personality and in exploring complex moral issues."

Weeks after picking up that prestigious award, Paris was nominated as a finalist for the inaugural Writers' Trust of Canada Shaughnessy Cohen Prize for Political Writing. As one of five authors on the short list, Paris automatically wins a $1,000 prize.

The other short-listed authors are Victoria Freeman, Myrna Kostash, Carol Off and Margaret Somerville. The winner is to be announced at an Ottawa awards dinner on May 2.

Paris, whose previous books include The End of Days (about Jewish history in Spain), The Garden and the Gun (about Israel) and Jews: An Account of Their Experience in Canada, said it was always hard to know why one book does better than another.

"I suspect that publishing with Knopf Canada has had something to do with the kind of outreach that Long Shadows has had," she said.

Winning the Pearson Prize and being nominated for the Shaughnessy Cohen Prize "feels marvelous, because every writer wants to be read and wants to have the widest audience possible. And these prizes extend the number of people who will read Long Shadows, and naturally that's important to me."

A Toronto-based production company, Sleeping Giant Productions, has begun work on a multi-part television documentary series based on Long Shadows in conjunction with a German television production company and distributor, Paris said.

The book has been translated for readers in Germany, and is slated for publication in both Britain and the United States in June.

"I'm very impressed that the judges for the Shaughnessy Cohen award have short-listed me," Paris said.

"I'm impressed that they've understood and have been willing to acknowledge that the implications of Long Shadows go beyond the specific countries that I'm dealing with, and they're as valid for Canada as for any other place, even though I don't deal specifically with Canada in the book."

Paris said she has not begun work on a new book as yet. "I'm going to be working on the film documentary series for the next while, but I hope to start something new in the fall," she said.

Jewish Health Alliance gets off the ground

By LEILA SPEISMAN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Psychotherapist Annette Poizner wanted to organize a group where Jews in different health professions could get together and exchange ideas.

She ran some ads to see if others were interested, and "people just kept calling in," she told The CJN in some amazement.

About 50 people of "different ages, and different specialties" came to a social evening in October, and the group decided that the idea was worth pursuing.

They formed the Jewish Health Alliance, a new organization of Jews in the health professions. It aims to be "a social and professional network" that will "explore the intersection between eastern and western medicine and Jewish thought," and will "foster dialogue between practitioners of different disciplines."

Organizers Betya Pereslegina, a homeopath; Marla Keyes, a registered massage therapist; and psychotherapists Poizner, Bonnie Fitzerman and David Bender hope to accomplish these goals through programs that combine information and opportunities for socializing.

Participants are from all streams of Jewish life, Poizner said, and from the whole range of the health professions, from dentists and doctors to practitioners of reflexology and shiatsu.

One might not expect practitioners of traditional and alternative medicines to have much too say to each other, but this group offers an opportunity to learn about each other's viewpoints and philosophies, Pereslegina said, and to realize that they all have something to offer. For instance, "a dentist who had never thought of the possibility of using acupuncture in his practice, may decide to look into it," she said.

So far, the alliance has hooked up with a different synagogue for each event. A program on Jewish meditation was co-produced with Kolel, while the most recent event, on Coping with Catastrophic Illness; a Jewish perspective for health care providers, was held in conjunction with The Village Shul.

The next one, Understanding Human Nature: a Jewish perspective for health and healing, to be led by Rabbi Michael Skobac on May 14 at 7:30, will be co-sponsored with the adult education program of Shaarei Shomayim Congregation.

The group hopes that future events will be at venues other than synagogues.

A fee of $10 is charged to cover refreshments.

"We try to make it as esthetically pleasing as we can," said Poizner.

The idea, Keyes said, is to explore illness "as a spiritual rite of passage. What do I do with it as a patient or a healer? Can I help [my patients] go through the process in a spiritual way?"

Some topics under consideration for the future include the connection between ethical and health issues, and political considerations surrounding health concerns.

For more information about The Jewish Health Alliance, contact them by e-mail at jewishhealthalliance@yahoo.com, or telephone 416-208-0610.

Bar-Ilan University launches medical teaching program

RAMAT GAN — Bar-Ilan University has established the Ethel and Simon F. Flegg Teacher Training Program for Medical Faculty in its Pinchas Churgin School of Education, the first program of its kind in Israel.

The program, which will provide the specialized skills needed by medical faculty in their capacity as educators, was made possible through a donation by Montreal philanthropist Simon F. Flegg.

"The impact of this training is extremely far reaching and will be felt throughout the medical system. The outcome of improved education is superior-trained doctors who best prepare their students for the science of medicine and the extraordinary task of healing," said Jerry Tollinsky, executive director of the Canadian Friends of Bar-Ilan University.

First program of its kind in Israel

The impetus for the project came from physicians engaged in teaching, who identified a strong correlation between the teaching expertise of professors, educational standards and the level of medical care in the community.

The school of education and the department of sociology at Bar-Ilan, in co-operation with the Israeli Society of Teachers of Family Medicine, will create a course of study that will offer the fundamental components of education in a framework especially designed for educators of family and community medicine. Successful models, including that of the department of family and community medicine at the University of Toronto, will be adapted.

The Ethel and Simon F. Flegg Teacher Training Program for Medical Faculty at Bar-Ilan University will be recognized by the Research Council of the Israeli Medical Association (IMA). The IMA and Bar-Ilan will provide post-graduate certification in medical education to all successful participants.

"In a nation that places human life as its highest value, achieving excellence in medical training is crucial. Recently, Israeli medical institutions have come to recognize that in order to teach well, doctors require in-depth knowledge of teaching as a profession, and not just medical knowledge," Tollinsky said.

Dr. Ruth Birger of the Bar-Ilan University faculty of social sciences, has been named co-ordinator of the courses in new program at Bar-Ilan.

Simon F. Flegg was born in Heidelberg, Germany. Arriving in Canada in 1931, he established several successful business ventures. He and his late wife Ethel have been active and involved members of Congregation Shaar Hashomayim for more than 40 years.

A vacation peppered with Jewish sites

By LEWIS ERIC LACHTER
Special to The CJN

If you're seeking a vacation peppered with stops at Jewish sites, here's some advice to guide you on your journey.

In London, a permanent exhibit devoted to the Holocaust has opened in a new five-floor wing of the Imperial War Museum. The exhibit occupies 13,000 square feet of space on two floors.

Venice's ancient Jewish cemetery has been fully restored. Located on the Lido, a short gondola ride from downtown Venice, the cemetery is considered a treasure of European Jewish heritage. Tours of the site are available on Wednesdays and Sundays at 2:30 p.m. and on Fridays at 10:30 a.m.

Cemetery tours can be combined with visits to the Jewish Museum of Venezia and the Jewish Ghetto (a must see). Soon to be fully restored in the ghetto is the Scuola Grande Tedesca or German Synagogue.

When you are in Madrid, visit Beth Yaacov, the capital city's largest and main synagogue. Over 800 Jewish families gathered there last Rosh Hashanah to welcome in the new year. There are four synagogues in Madrid and the total Jewish population of the city is 3,000.

Closer to home is Tombstone, Ariz, not one of my favourite tourist sites, but it is worth visiting for a few hours. You can witness a re-enactment of the fierce "gunfight at the OK Corral," stroll along the wooden sidewalks, and shop in the many stores selling wild west stuff.

A Jewish highlight is the Jewish cemetery which was restored in 1983 and is a registered national monument.

In Las Vegas, Nev. the Solomon Guggenheim Foundation has opened an impressive art gallery at the Venetian Resort. Participating in the gallery is the State Hermitage Museum of St. Petersburg, Russia, a museum with origins dating from 1750.

Judah L Magnes Museum in Berkeley, CA has a new show called Telling Time: To Everything There Is a Season. The exhibition features 250 objects which include paintings, sculpture, prints, drawings, film and Judaica. The show closes in May 2002. In nearby San Francisco, the Jewish Film Festival will flick on from July 20 to Aug. 7 at the Castro Theatre and other venues.

Chicago's Spertus Museum has a fascinating new show called Past Perfect: The Jewish Experience in Early 20th Century Postcards. Colourful picture postcards tell the story of the Jewish people in the era before e-mail. The exhibition closes Aug. 26. Also, check out the wonderful Roman Vishniac photo show Children of a Vanished World, which Closes Aug. 31.

Folkdancers kick up their heels at the BJCC

By NEIL BECKER
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — For those who want to spice up their lives, learn something new and get a good cardiovascular workout, Israeli folkdancing at the Bathurst Jewish Community Centre (BJCC) may be just the answer.

Every Monday and Tuesday in the Studio Theatre, a group of men and women of all ages enjoy this traditional – yet changing – form of dance.

"Israeli dancing has a long history dating back to the days of the chalutzim [pioneers]. Israeli dancing in its present form is an expression of Jewish heritage and culture," instructor Laurie Markus said.

Participant Debbie Bergson began Israeli folkdancing because she wanted to learn more about her cultural background and get a workout in the process.

"I like it because of the fact that we learn about our heritage," she said.

Israeli folkdancing for beginners and intermediates is offered on Monday nights at 8:30 p.m. The larger Tuesday night session starts at 8 p.m. for intermediates and 9 p.m. for advanced dancers.

"The program is structured so that you don't have to sign up for a set number of classes. Rather, you come on the appropriate night and pay as you go. This is the basic structure of Israeli dance classes around the world," Markus said. "Our classes run year round, breaking only for Jewish holidays."

During the session, the class learns specific dances created by Israeli choreographers. The dances are done in circles, lines, with couples or even in scatter formation.

It's a pressure-free atmosphere in which the main purpose is to enjoy oneself, catch up with old friends and meet new people.

"The dancing is basically for fun. No one is worried about your style or technique," Markus said.

Teme Kernerman, who co-ordinates the folkdance activities at the BJCC, said Israeli folkdancing draws its style and terminology from various sources.

"It's like a melting pot of cultures. Mayim, Tcherkessia, Yemenite and Debka are some of the steps used in Israeli dance," she explained.

[Photo by Neil Becker]

The music varies in tempo and ranges from traditional melodies like horahs to modern Israeli popular songs. Dances are also created to music based on the various cultural influences in Israeli society today.

Israeli dance has a long history in the GTA. The Rikudiyah, an Israeli children's dance festival, has been taking place here annually for 31 years.

Through their involvement in the festival, a number of Hebrew schools have incorporated Israeli dance into their curricula.

When it comes to adults, in Toronto, more women generally participate than men. In Israel the numbers are fairly even, and therefore more partner dances are performed.

"In addition to the sessions at the BJCC, Israeli dance classes are held at the Bloor JCC and at Thornlea Secondary School," Markus said.

For more information, contact Teme Kernerman at the Bathurst Jewish Community Centre, 416-636-1880.

Israel loses 10th straight match on the road

By ASHER GOLDBERG
Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

VIENNA — It started well and ended badly.

After scoring a goal and looking promising in front of 22,000 fans at Vienna's Ernst Happel Stadium, Israel conceded two goals on the way to losing the contest.

The three priceless points paved the way for Austria to leap over Israel in Group 7 of the World Cup qualifying campaign.

The Israeli team could have ended the game with much more than it did. But once again, Israel finds itself looking for excuses as to why the team is pitiful away from home. This was Israel's 10th successive on the road defeat.

The loss hinders Israel's chance of qualifying for next summer's World Cup to be held in Japan and South Korea.

Israel now finds itself in third place in Group 7 of UEFA qualifying. The first-place team – soccer powerhouse Spain – automatically qualifies and the second-place team – currently Austria – plays against another group's runner-up.

Currently two points behind Austria, Israel will probably have to win at least one of its remaining road games against Liechtenstein and Bosnia-Herzegovina, and then beat Austria at home in order to finish second.

There were, however, some bright spots in the Israeli game.

Israeli coach Richard Nielsen made a bold move at the start of the game, opening without any recognized strikers in attack. Instead, Avi Nimni played up front, with Eyal Berkovic and Yossi Banayoun playing just behind him.

Israel unexpectedly got on the scoreboard after Austria's Michael Baur put the ball in the back of his own net in the sixth minute.

Baur turned from villain to hero within the space of three minutes when he struck a powerful header, connecting with a free kick coming in from the right, to level the score at 1-1.

Israel had a chance to go ahead again but missed from the penalty spot.

Foolishness and apathy

As I was saying...

By RON CSILLAG

Two things on my mind, in no special order:

This is getting a bit stale, but Hedy Fry should be sacked. The multiculturalism minister made a fool of herself and her department recently by rising in the House of Commons and recounting the fanciful tale of crosses burning on the lawns of Prince George, B.C. The Ku Klux Klan, she intimated, was alive and well and in fighting trim out west.

It all came as a big surprise to the citizens of Prince George, and especially to its police force and municipal officials, who had no idea what Fry was talking about. That's especially strange, given the minister's explanation that she based her accusations on a letter purportedly written to her by the town's mayor.

In any event, the fuss around Fry has died down and the media have moved on to the latest scandal du jour. But Fry has lost a lot, if not all of her credibility, and that counts for much. For apart from doling out money, her department relies, as no other federal ministry does, mostly on appearances. The appearance of caring about, of supporting and nurturing minority groups is vital for a government that insists it is inclusive and has been faithful to its small-l liberal roots. Any goodwill Fry may have built up with ethnic groups, including the Jewish community, has now been squandered in a flash of spectacularly poor judgment, even if she merely relied on the advice of underlings. And her apology for the fiasco was empty.

So she should go, if only for the sake of appearances.

(I'm not normally conspiratorial by nature, but it wouldn't surprise me in the least if this "letter" from the mayor of Prince George was a plant by the Canadian Alliance to discredit a ministry it openly detests.)

The other thing:

When I reported on Montreal's Jewish community in another life, a local gadfly and inveterate letter-to-the-editor writer named Reuven Carin was always bending my ear on how laughable he found Canadian Jewish Congress's self-description as the "parliament of Canadian Jewry." Parliaments, he opined, are democratic, and Congress was run by a bunch of totalitarian male millionaires who consulted no one but each other.

I see now that Carin's passion was misdirected. For it's not that Congress is undemocratic, it's that the Jewish public appears apathetic.

Consider this: Every single elected position within CJC will be filled by acclamation at its national plenary here next month. All the elected national positions – president, chair of the national executive, associate chair of the national executive, secretary, treasurer and honorary legal counsel – saw exactly one person run for each slot. The top two Ontario positions, chair and national vice-president, were also filled by acclamation.

This is an old dilemma facing Jewish organizations, again involving appearances. American observer Alan Dershowitz has complained that to be a Jewish leader with visibility and clout, you have to be a millionaire. So if only the wealthy can afford the time to steer Congress, it naturally appears that the rich and powerful are in charge, and nuts to the little guy who's too busy making a living to attend meetings.

That doesn't hold true, however, for the current as well as the next CJC president, and for several of their predecessors. It just seems that most of us aren't interested in doing what our parents and grandparents did almost as a matter of course.

At next month's plenary, CJC is subsidizing the attendance of some 200 university students. Here's hoping they'll ensure that the next election will be worth watching.

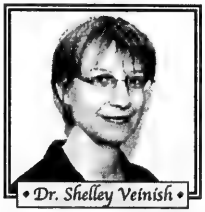
Seniors & Health



Dr. Shelley Veinish

Dear Dr. Veinish,

I'm in my early 70s and I don't seem to get enough sleep. My sister suggests I try sleeping pills so I can get a good night's rest.

Ellen S.

Dear Ellen,

Many of us spend our waking hours dreaming about sleep. If you are concerned about your sleep habits, you should focus on the quality, rather than the quantity, of sleep you get. There are two questions you should ask yourself: "Do I feel well-rested when I wake up each morning?" and "Am I able to remain awake and alert all day?"

If the answer to both is "yes," it's likely that simple adjustments to your daily schedule and evening routine are all that are needed to help you get a good night's sleep. These adjustments are based on the principles of what the experts call "good sleep hygiene."

Habit often prompts us to retire to bed at a regular hour, regardless of our level of fatigue. While it's important to maintain a regular schedule of activities each day for sleeping, eating and exercising, it's also necessary to ensure that bedtime comes at a time when you are tired and ready for sleep.

Never nap after 3 p.m., or for longer than one hour. Exercising, eating a large meal, or drinking caffeine or alcohol four to six hours before bed may also interfere with sleep. Although a nightcap may initially promote drowsiness, it also causes rebound wakefulness within hours. Smoking, always a hazardous activity in bed, is also a stimulant. A warm bath followed by a light snack is one relaxing bedtime ritual that is sometimes helpful.

Be careful of over-the-counter sleeping pills, many of which contain antihistamines or anti-nausea agents. These drugs not only affect the quality of your sleep, they can also exacerbate an underlying medical condition. They may also cause excessive daytime drowsiness, resulting in increased accidents, falls and fractures. Prescription "sleeping pills" are associated with similar risks, and any initial benefit which they may produce is quickly lost within the first few weeks of daily use.

If the simple measures described above are not sufficient to remedy the situation, or if you answered "no" to the above questions, you should consult your family doctor for a comprehensive assessment to rule out an underlying medical condition. Sleep disturbances require a holistic approach to ensure you get the best night's sleep possible.

Sweet dreams.

Dr. Shelley Veinish is a geriatrician at Baycrest Centre for Geriatric Care and assistant professor in the faculty of medicine at the University of Toronto.

Canada's UN votes seen as neutral

By RON CSILLAG
Staff Reporter

Canada has again voted in favour of a United Nations resolution highly critical of Israel's policy on settlements in the territories, but abstained on other anti-Israel measures adopted by the world body last week.

Canada's votes on April 18 on five Arab-backed resolutions condemning Israel for alleged human rights violations against Palestinians, are identical to its stand on the same issues a year ago, and are not seen as a shift in policy.

Five anti-Israel resolutions

But notably, the Canada-Israel Committee (CIC) is pleased that Canada voted against a resolution that called for countering "defamation of religions" as a way to promote human rights. The CIC believes Canada's stand presages this country's commitment to prevent the return of the Zionism-equals-racism debate at a UN-sponsored conference this summer.

All the votes took place at the conclusion of the UN Commission on Human Rights' (UNCHR) annual session in Geneva.

The News in Brief

CANADA

Funding Denied

OTTAWA — A Canadian group called the Association for Genital Integrity has been declined public funding to launch a court challenge aimed at banning the routine circumcision of baby boys. The group's contention was the Criminal Code, which prohibits female genital mutilation, discriminates against men by not providing equal protection under the law. Its application for public money from the Federal Court Challenges Program to fund its case was opposed by Jewish and Muslim groups, and Canadian Jewish Congress welcomed the decision to turn it down.

Red Deer Recruitment

CALGARY — A U.S.-based white supremacist movement appears to have targeted Calgary and Red Deer for a leaflet and poster campaign, the Calgary Herald reported. Last week, residents of Red Deer found handouts promoting a dominant white culture posted on light poles and in doorways. The source of the handouts is the West Virginia-based National Alliance, whose founder, William Pierce, wrote the neo-Nazi treatise, The Turner Diaries. In January, National Alliance flyers and business cards were found in books at Calgary public libraries and in copies of the University of Calgary's student newspaper, the Gauntlet.

Messianic Times

THORNHILL — Residents of Thornhill were upset to find a copy of the Messianic Times on their doorsteps recently. The winter 2000 edition of the slickly produced publication, which touts Jesus as the Jewish messiah, was delivered to dozens of Jewish homes on Easter Sunday. Canadian Jewish Congress denounced the development as the latest in a "stealth" campaign by Jews for Jesus-type groups to target Jews for conversion.

Tribute to Waxman

TORONTO — A tribute to the late actor Al Waxman will be held at a gala dinner as part of upcoming Canadian Jewish Congress plenary. Waxman had been named plenary chair before his death in January. To be hosted by CBC news anchor Peter Mansbridge, the event also features Waxman's King of Kensington co-star Fiona Reid, and Richard Monette, artistic director of the Stratford Festival. Waxman's wife Sara is also expected to attend. The gala is scheduled for Sunday, May 6, at 8 p.m. at the Inn on the Park in Toronto.

ISRAEL

Teen Violence Up

JERUSALEM — Israel ranks eighth in the world in teenage violence, according to statistics presented at a conference on the subject last week. Police figures indicate that some 30,155 Israeli youths were involved in violence last year, compared with 28,941 in 1999.

Sharon's Son

JERUSALEM — Israel's attorney general has told Prime Minister Ariel Sharon that he must stop sending his son on diplomatic missions to meet with Palestinian Authority President Yasser Arafat. Elyakim Rubinstein said that using Omri Sharon for this purpose violates a law that forbids senior officials from employing close relatives.

WORLD

Nazi Probe

BERLIN — German authorities have opened an investigation into a 92-year-old former SS officer wanted in Italy for war crimes committed during World War II. In 1999, an Italian court found Friedrich Engel responsible for the deaths of at least 246 Italians in 1944 and 1945. Italian media have dubbed Engel the "Butcher of Genoa."

Torah Replacements

SOFIA — A Torah from Kansas City is slated to arrive in the Bulgarian capital as part of an American program to replace 11 scrolls stolen in late February from Sofia's Central Synagogue. International police are investigating the theft of the Torahs, believed to have been spirited out of the country.

Novel Wins Pulitzer

NEW YORK — An American Jewish author has won a Pulitzer Prize for his novel about a young Jew who escapes from Czechoslovakia on the eve of World War II. In Michael Chabon's The Amazing Adventures of Kavalier and Clay, Joe Kavalier makes it big in the U.S. comic book business before the events of the Holocaust catch up with him.

Canada 'Concerned' Over Mideast Violence

OTTAWA — John Manley, minister of foreign affairs, last week expressed "deep concern" over escalating tensions in the Middle East, including attacks across borders.

"Everything must be done to stop this senseless cycle of attack and retaliation that leads absolutely nowhere," Manley said in a prepared statement.

"All parties in the region must work toward reining in those who are bent on violence."

Manley said Canada was closely monitoring events along Israel's northern border. "Israel fulfilled its obligations under United Nations Security Council Resolution 425 when it withdrew from Lebanese territory in May 2000. Recent attacks by Hezbollah demonstrate once again the need for Lebanon to deploy its military in force in the south."

Regarding Israeli air strikes against Syrian positions, Manley said he was concerned by the escalation. "History has demonstrated that there is no military solution to the Arab-Israeli differences. A solution can be found only through negotiations."

Landy daunted, excited by CJC's large agenda

New president to be installed at Plenary Assembly

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Keith Landy, acclaimed incoming national president of Canadian Jewish Congress, sees the organization moving towards a proactive agenda.

He will be installed as president at CJC's 26th Plenary Assembly to be held here on May 6 and 7.

The current chair of CJC, Ontario region, Landy says that with each generation, Congress has renewed itself in terms of its main focus.

"Over the last 50 years, its focus has been to track down Nazi war criminals and advocate to the government to have them expelled.

"As time moves on, however, I believe CJC should be moving towards an agenda with the main purpose of advocacy on social issues such as affordable housing for the elderly, child poverty, status of women and government funding for Jewish day schools," Landy said in a recent interview.

These are issues he has dealt with in his provincial capacity, he said, and he intends to bring the same issues to the national agenda.

Landy, 50, a partner in the law firm of Landy, Marr & Associates and a member of Shaar Shalom Synagogue in Thornhill, was born in England and lived in South Africa for 13 years before moving to Canada more than 30 years ago. While in Johannesburg, he was active in several youth groups "that covered the spectrum," including Habonim, Betar and Bnei Akiva. His late father was a rabbi.

Landy's wife Janice is incoming president of National Council of Jewish Women, Toronto section.

"My father instilled in me the importance of community work and the beauty of what our religion has to offer. Growing up in South Africa we were sensitized to social conditions and politics at an early age, particularly as they related to Zionism and Israel," Landy said.

Canada, he said, is one of the most dynamic, vibrant Jewish communities in the world outside of Israel, "but we do have some troubling times.

"In Congress, our role is to ensure that here in Canada, politicians and the public are given a balanced and fair assessment of what is going on in the Middle East in a historical context. There is a whole generation of [youth] who are unfamiliar with the history of the Middle East. There will be peace in Israel – there is not a war in history that has not ended – but we have to support Israel in whatever way we can." said Landy.

The three prongs of CJC's mission, he said, are advocacy, representation and defence. "In the defence aspect, we are fighting anti-Semitism, but lately it has taken on a new veneer, particularly with what is going on in the Middle East."

In terms of advocacy and representation, he said, CJC must brief politicians on matters of importance to the Jewish community, and meet regularly with ministers and with the prime minister.

Keith Landy

Congress must remain relevant and show leadership, said Landy. "There has been a

Responding to readers

From the editor's desk

Normally, I do not respond to letters to the editor. I do not believe it is appropriate for the editor or for reporters to "have the last word" over readers.

Apart from our Guest Voice column, which is reserved for unsolicited reflections or opinions from readers, the letters-to-the-editor page is the only spot in the paper available to readers to express themselves freely. Thus, that spot, in a certain sense, "belongs" to our readers. As a result, we give readers relatively wide latitude to comment on what they have read in the paper.

However, there are exceptions to that policy. For example, a reporter is entitled to respond briefly to a letter in which he or she is specifically mentioned to correct an erroneous or unfair assertion. And sometimes the language used in a letter may warrant editorial response. Such is the case with the letters in today's issue.

Those readers reacted strongly to the proposition that accompanied two photographs on page one of the April 12 CJN issue that there were "different values underlying Palestinian and Israeli societies." Their reactions included accusations of "hate-mongering," "racism" and "bigotry," among others.

I accept that people would disagree with that proposition; I accept, too, that the proposition may have been clumsily phrased, and that the photos do not prove the proposition, as one of the letter writers pointed out. But I reject any reliance upon insult and aspersion.

Moreover, I still believe the proposition itself to be valid.

The photos, by coincidence, arrived in our office the same week. One showed a group of young Israeli teens grieving at a cemetery. The other showed a group of young Palestinian boys, all of them appearing to be under the age of 10, in junior-size battle fatigues, "training" with toy guns during a rally by Islamic Jihad against Israel.

The juxtaposition of the photos did not suggest, nor would we ever suggest, that Palestinians do not grieve when they suffer loss. That would indeed be abhorrent and repulsive.

Nor did it imply that Israeli boys do not train with weapons. That would be factually incorrect, although weapons training in Israel occurs when Israeli youth are inducted into the army.

The Israeli boys were grieving for their friend Naftali Lantzkoren who was killed by a suicide bomber. Naftali himself was still a child, only 14 years old. The bomber, who targeted him and his friends waiting for their school bus, was sent by Islamic Jihad, the very group "training" the young Palestinian boys in that page one photo.

For what purpose, one might ask, are those young boys training? And what do they learn as they train? According to Sheikh Ibrahim Sirbil, head of Islamic Jihad's Al-Aqsa battalion, "We want to liberate Palestine from the Jordan River to the Mediterranean Sea." To ensure the young charges do not forget their lesson, Jihad's logo makes it plain: "Kill them [Jews] wherever you find them. Uproot them from where they evicted you."

Hamas provides the same "training" to young Palestinians. "We are in a state of war, and in a state of war, all Israeli targets are legitimate," Prof. Ismael Abu Shanab a local Hamas leader recently proclaimed, explaining why his conscience was not bothered by the targeted slaughter of Israeli children.

Even if we accept, for argument's sake, that Islamic Jihad and Hamas do not represent mainstream Palestinian society, where are the voices of the mainstream condemning wanton murder and terror? Yasser Arafat, the leader of mainstream Palestinian society, has never once criticized, let alone condemned, in Arabic, to Palestinians, the purposes or the tactics of Islamic Jihad and Hamas. He has never told his people, in Arabic, to abandon forever the dream of dismantling Israel.

In fact, the reverse is true. In the legislative assembly of the PA, political leaders demand the right of full return for Palestinian refugees. On the ground, a PA sniper trains the crosshairs of his rifle on a 10-month-old baby. In schools, children are taught the arithmetic of detesting Jews. In mosques, worshippers are incited to kill Jews.

Palestinian political, military, educational and religious leaders continue to inculcate into their society values that are antithetical to democratic values: respect for human life, the rule of law and compromise.

A simple example relating to the commemoration of Yom Hashoah last week is illustrative of the values espoused in mainstream Palestinian society. The official PA newspaper Al-Hayat Al-Jadida wrote: "Employing scientific and chemical evidence, [a recent book] proves that the figure of six million Jews cremated in the Nazi Auschwitz camps is a lie… as the most spacious of the vaults in the camp could not have held even one percent of that number.

"We are concerned that these dramatic cries regarding the holocaust… are intended to cover up the corresponding holocaust, that which Zionism is now producing… against the Arabs in Palestine."

No one would deny that David Irving and Ernst Zundel for example, mourn and grieve when their loved ones die or are killed. But would anyone deny Irving and Zundel have "different values" than we do? Is it not cause for regret that they do?

Several Jewish high schools make the top grade

Fraser Institute report card issues ratings

By ANNA MORGAN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Several Jewish schools have placed in the top category in the recent rating of provincial high schools.

However, many educators are questioning the validity of the rankings based on information obtained from the Ontario Ministry of Education which receives the data from each school.

The Report Card on Ontario's Secondary Schools was prepared by the Fraser Institute, a Vancouver-based company. It ranked Ontario's high schools using several academic criteria – including the number of students taking advanced level courses, percentage of courses passed, number of core subjects taken in Grade 12 and OAC (Grade 13), and the gap in marks between boys and girls in advanced Grade 12 English and math.

The Ottawa Torah Institute and Ner Yisrael Yeshiva College scored perfect tens. Beth Jacob High School for Girls scored 9.1.

The Bnei Akiva Schools – which includes Ulpanat Orot Girls' School and Or Chaim Boys' School – scored 4.9.

The Fraser Institute did not provide an overall rank for The Community Hebrew Academy in Toronto because it did not feel that it had enough information available from the Ontario Ministry of Education.

"We are very puzzled as to why CHAT's rating wasn't listed," Paul Shaviv said. "We file the appropriate records with the ministry every year.

"We did note that several other schools were also not ranked because of insufficient data."

Shaviv, the school headmaster, said that while he believes that CHAT's academic record is well known, a real measure of a school would be to compare the kids when they leave the school to what they were like when they came in.

CHAT is a community school that takes in all students – including ESL (English as a second language) and special education students.

"The fact that 99.4 percent of all courses taken at our school were at an advanced level is an exceptional statistic," Shaviv said.

CHAT, the only co-educational Jewish high school on the list, shows an escalating gender gap – with girls doing better than boys in language arts and math.

Rabbi Eliezer Ben-Porat, dean of the Ottawa Torah Institute believes that his school achieved a ranking of 10 because of a very high quality student body.

"The students come here because they're motivated and want to be here."

The school, which has 28 students is not co-ed, with the girls and boys learning in different parts of the city. The principal of the secular studies is Jack Shapiro.

"Some of our classes have only two or three students. A large class would have seven students," Ben-Porat said.

Norman Smith, the principal of the Bnei Akiva Schools has some questions about the Fraser Institute's numbers.

"In previous years, we scored 10 and, as far as I can tell, not that much has changed in our school to account for the drop in the rating," Smith said.

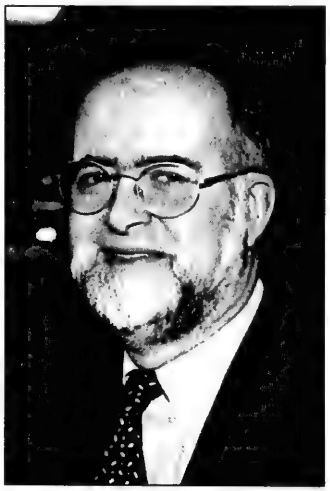
"However," Smith said, "we have to be careful looking at any ranking system. A lot of things go into understanding educational statistics. They're not hockey scores."

Rabbi Akiva Stefansky, the principal of Beth Jacob High School for Girls, said that his school focuses on building the personality of each of its students.

"Our students are educated in a totally Jewish environment that doesn't adjust to the whims of pop culture.

"The fact that they managed to do so well must mean that the quality of our education is very strong," Rabbi Stefansky said.

David Wagman, the principal of Ner Israel, said he is very proud of the students, teachers and rabbis who have supported the school, and credit should go to Tom Widrich, the former principal. However, Wagman feels that these kinds of tests can be very misleading.



Paul Shaviv

"In many ways, these kinds of rankings are simply testing the socio-economic backgrounds of families.

"Ranking schools according to the criteria used is very dangerous," Wagman said.

"Schools who are doing great jobs raising literacy rates," he noted, "could get phased out because of these kinds of tests."

Yom Hashoah commemoration draws 2,000

By RON CSILLAG
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Over 2,000 people braved a spring chill last Wednesday night at Earl Bales Park for the community's annual Yom Hashoah V'Hagvurah commemoration, and to pay homage to two gentile families brave enough to have made a difference.

Israel's consul general in Toronto, Meir Romem, on behalf of Yad Vashem in Jerusalem, presented Righteous Among the Nations medals to Catharina Robbertsen, 86, and Gabriele Chvedukas, 83, in recognition of their families' heroics during World War II.

The Robbertsens – Catharina and her parents Hendrik and Lina – were the only Protestant family in a small town in southern Holland. They were honoured for having sheltered seven Jews in their farmhouse in 1943 and 1944, including a woman who gave birth while in hiding.

"It was a question of life and death," Robbertsen, who lives in Scarborough, told reporters. "These people really needed help."

Chvedukas, who lives in Mississauga, accepted the medal on behalf of her parents, Ignas and Elena Anuzis, who hid young Hasia Gaslevich shortly after the Nazis invaded Lithuania. When the Anuzis' suffered economic hardship, they sent their charge to live with their son in Kovno. The family also gave refuge to other Jews, including two young girls.

See page 20

Gaslevich now lives in Haifa, and tracked down the Anuzis in the United States after the war. The family came to Canada in 1948.

"I am so honoured," Chvedukas said later in a frail voice.

The intermingling of young students and Holocaust survivors exemplified the theme of this year's service, From Persecution to Survival. The evening was billed as the largest such commemoration outside Israel.

Catharina Robbertsen, (left) designated Righteous Among the Nations, lights a memorial candle with help from volunteer Rachel Iskov.

Six memorial candles were lit, each representing the Holocaust's six million Jewish victims, the 1.5 million children murdered, the children of survivors, partisans and resistance fighters, and Allied forces. Robbertsen lit the candle for the Righteous Among the Nations.

Students at several Toronto day schools recited various reflections, and dramatic English, Yiddish and Hebrew readings were interspersed with songs and prayer.

Two local survivors, Faigie Libman and Elly Gotz, recounted their personal, harrowing tales of how they survived during the Holocaust. Libman, a longtime teacher at Associated Hebrew Schools, survived the Kovno Ghetto and three labour camps. Gotz, a well-known Holocaust educator and volunteer, also survived Kovno as well as Dachau.

Members of General Wingate Branch 256 of the Royal Canadian Legion and the Jewish War Veterans of Canada marched the colours on and off. Cantor Yaacov Motzen led the recitation of Kel Malei Rachamim and Zog Nit Keynmol (the Partisan's Song). Rabbi Moshe Stern sounded the shofar.

The next day, Ontario Lieutenant Governor Hilary Weston opened the government's speech from the throne by acknowledging Yom Hashoah.

"Today, on Yom Hashoah, we pause to remember victims of the Holocaust," Weston stated. "We join citizens around the world in pledging, 'Never again.' "

Also last week, the Canadian Holocaust Remembrance Association sponsored a Holocaust memorial service at Beth Radom Congregation, officiated by rabbis David Bagley and Philip Scheim.

As well, B'nai Brith Canada conducted its annual Unto Every Person There is a Name service in Toronto, Guelph, Peterborough, Kingston, Unionville and Winnipeg.

A FESTIVAL OF NEW YIDDISH CULTURE

AshkeNEWS...

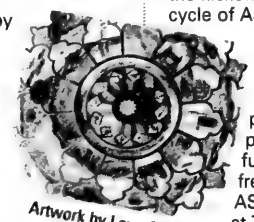
ASHKENAZ PRESENTS ILLUMINATIONS: VISIONS OF THE POETS, PROPHETS, AND SAGES

This spring, the ASHKENAZ cultural calendar is highlighted by the upcoming "Illuminations: Visions Of The Poets, Prophets, and Sages" visual art show. This exhibition can be viewed at the Liss Gallery from May 4-13, proudly presented in conjunction with UJA FEDERATION as part of the Jewish Toronto Tomorrow Initiative.



Artwork by Laya Crust

AN ART SHOW LIKE NO OTHER

Ian Leventhal, Curator, Illuminations

A feast for the eyes and soul, "Illuminations" is curated by one of Toronto's best-known visual artists, Ian Leventhal. The exhibition features over 50 paintings from eight prominent Toronto-based artists whose works reflect their personal spiritual odyssey through Jewish literary masterpieces. Dubi Arie, Laya Crust, Gina Godfrey, Ian Leventhal, Heather Levine, Lisa Rotenberg, Judy Singer and Pedie Wolfond have all drawn upon the 4,000 year-old history of Jewish writings for inspiration. The Five Books of Moses, the Psalms, the Prophets, and Yiddish poetry have all proved fertile ground for their vision. Through the artists' eye, the viewer is confronted with a visual interpretation of a cornucopia of Jewish thought, from the sacred to the secular.

FESTIVAL DATES CONFIRMED

"Illuminations" is also the kickoff to the next cycle of ASHKENAZ programming. Over the next 16 months, the ASHEKNAZ Foundation will be presenting exciting artistic performances, educational programs and unprecedented fundraising events, increasing in frequency and culminating in the ASHKENAZ Festival, taking place at Toronto's Harbourfront Centre from August 26-September 2, 2002.

As one of the premiere arts and world cultural festivals in the beautiful meeting place that is Toronto, ASHKENAZ crosses the religious divide. Jews and non-Jews alike find common ground in the mutual enjoyment of traditional and contemporary Yiddish music and art. For the first time in 50 years, Yiddish traditions have made it onto the centre stage of Canada's cultural mosaic.

In the coming months, detailed information will become available about the programs leading up to ASHKENAZ 2002.

JTT – THE FUTURE IS HERE

Jewish Toronto Tomorrow (JTT), UJA FEDERATION's initiative to ensure a bright future for Toronto's Jewish community, is partnering with Ashkenaz- which showcases Jewish arts and culture through a popular festival and other events.

JTT exemplifies the new philanthropy which is based on cooperative relationships which match the needs of various community organizations with the vision, interests, and experience of philanthropists.

"For many Jews, the world-renowned Ashkenaz Festival is a powerful link to Jewish life and Jewish history. We're proud to help so many people discover the heart and soul of their heritage," said Gloria Snow, Director of JTT's Capital Projects.

"We're thrilled that Jewish Toronto Tomorrow shares the same passion that we do for our Jewish culture, our Jewish roots and the rich Yiddish language. Because of this shared passion in all things Jewish, we'll be able to organize the best and biggest Ashkenaz Festival ever next year," adds Helen Daniels, Ashkenaz chair.

JTT is the most ambitious initiative in the history of Jewish Toronto, bringing together community planning and fundraising in a logical, hands-on, cutting edge way to meet the needs of a dramatically growing Jewish population. Yom Hazikaron, Yom Ha'atzmaut

This editorial appeared in The CJN six years ago. In light of recent events in the Middle East, we republish it. Yom Ha'atzmaut is on Iyar 5.

A story is told about a Jew from Canada who visited Jerusalem on Yom Hazikaron, the day set aside by the Knesset to remember Israel's fallen soldiers. He went to Har Herzl to take part in the remembrance ceremonies. As often happens in the hills of Jerusalem in early May, even before noon, the sky was a very deep blue, the kind of blue that falls closer to violet than to green, the kind of blue that must be t'chelet. A mild breeze blew from the valley to the west, cool against the sun, carrying whispers through the branches of the pine trees. And the quality of the light was dazzling, allowing the eye to see the smallest detail on the furthermost horizon.

There were many people on the mountain that clear spring morning, almost all of them hovering for a time near a grave, leaving behind a stone or a flower, a marker of their permanent love.

After the remembrance ceremony, the Canadian happened to notice an old man crying inconsolably at one particular grave site. As he moved closer and could hear the old man's sobbing, he realized the grave belonged to the old man's son. Others, undoubtedly members of the family, tried to comfort the old man and remove him from his anguish and grief. But the old man refused to be comforted and refused to be moved. Instead, he stretched his arms across the grave, embracing the stone, occasionally tracing with his bony fingers the name carved into the rock's hewn face, quietly sobbing.

The Canadian sat nearby, terribly shaken by the old man's loss and overwhelmed by his sorrow. He watched as mourning matched memory and grief poured forth endlessly from the parent like the relentless rays of the sun high above in the deep blue sky.

The next day, which actually began the night before, the Canadian Jew went out into the boulevards of Jerusalem to celebrate Yom Ha'atzmaut with the rest of Israel. The streets were alive with festival and song. The small park near his hotel was filled with picnics and parties.

By a coincidence of light and timing, he caught sight of a group across the way singing, laughing and dancing. As he approached, hoping to join their circle, he saw in its very middle the same old man whose heart he had seen broken the day before, now swaying and twirling, waving his arms and singing with energy and enthusiasm.

Unable to contain his curiosity, he went over to the old man and asked him politely, in the manner of most Canadians: "Only yesterday, I saw you lie down at your son's grave, calling to heaven, your tears watering the earth. How can you dance and celebrate this way today?"

The old man seemed pleased with the question. "How can I not celebrate this way? My son fought and died so that I would be able to dance this day." The Canadian Jew understood and was immediately welcomed to join in the dancing circle, which he did with joy.

I was appalled to see the deliberately manufactured imagery on the cover of The CJN – imagery that was tantamount to hate mongering. The caption below the two central photos stated that "these two photos... starkly depict the different values underlying Palestinian and Israeli societies."

I ask the editors to elaborate upon what claims they are attempting to make about Israeli and Palestinian societies. Is it that Palestinians are uncaring, cold, dehumanized war machines imposing their wrath upon peaceful, warm, humane Israelis?

Such a deliberate misuse of these photos attempts to capitalize upon the grief of Israeli students, a grief that is just as much a reality for Palestinians today, despite what the photographs would have us believe.

Why not publish images of the many homes bulldozed by the Israeli state and the grieving, now homeless Palestinians, or images of grieving relatives of dead Palestinians shot by the Israeli military?

The spread that The CJN chose to run, accompanied by that caption, presents a simplistic, self serving interpretation of Israeli and Palestinian societies. The light that it attempts to cast upon these peoples is one of generalized untruths that uphold racism, something as Jewish people I would hope we would be more critical of.

The two photographs that you placed on page 1 should not have been juxtaposed to "starkly depict the different values underlying Palestinian and Israeli societies." The comparison seems to imply that Palestinians do not mourn for their murdered relatives and friends, whereas Jewish Israelis are grief stricken.

Perhaps a more appropriate comparison would have been to show photographs of Palestinians and Israelis mourning the murder of their loved ones in the same week, or alternately, of Israelis and Palestinians preparing for combat the same week. Your readers may see that in those cases, the values of these two societies are not so different after all.

Surely your front page images would have been more poignant had you shown Israeli boys weeping for a slain friend and then training with their weapons – the tragic duality of their lives.

Instead, you show Israeli boys mourning and Palestinian boys training with the caption "...depicting different values underlying Palestinian and Israeli societies." Don't Israeli boys train with weapons and Palestinian boys weep at funerals? The front page reveals only your particular choice of shots, not a difference in values.

The caption under your front page photos was the most blatant evidence of bigotry I have ever read in your newspaper.

If some non-Jewish publication had made a similarly foolish conclusion from two photos, juxtaposed as you have, such as Israeli soldiers shooting at a group of rock-throwing Palestinians mourning the death of a child at the hands of Israeli soldiers, we Jews would all be crying foul.

Since when do we fight bigotry with bigotry?

I was offended and embarrassed by your front page photo and caption. Surely this is not objective journalism. If a Palestinian paper had published photos with such a caption, illustrating young people grieving over the death of a Palestinian youth and contrasting it with a photo of militant young Israelis, "depicting the different values underlying the two societies," The CJN would be quick to denounce it as biased reporting at best, hate literature at worst.

And what could be the purpose of such reporting? To enhance understanding? To promote a peaceful solution? To promote prejudice? Or to incite hatred?

Zionism, post-Zionism and values education on a 440-metre track

By SEYMOUR EPSTEIN

On our recent family Pesach trip to Israel, some thoughts about the Jewish State came to me in the strangest place. As we approach Yom Ha'atzmaut, it might be fitting to impart those thoughts – reflections on the values that make Medinat Yisrael worth the struggle. But before that, some background.

When we were living in Jerusalem some years ago, my family frequented the modest running track at the Hebrew University's Givat Ram campus, the Givat Ram 440. My wife and I used it for training in preparation for a Jerusalem half-marathon. Some Saturday nights we would bring our kids for a post-Shabbat run on the unlit track. It was used by other amateurs like ourselves, as well as by school groups, police units and the army. There was even a psychiatrist who brought his patients once a week for running therapy.

However, with all of the athletic enjoyment that I received from this track, I also witnessed some bad moments of poor sportsmanship and weak teaching that stayed with me. One incident in particular I had wanted to record in an op-ed piece, but had resisted writing it at the time.

I was running some miles when a school group arrived with the usual crew of physical education teachers. The teachers were not running themselves. They were merely ticking off times on a clipboard. Not one student was singled out for commendation or critique. No one was having any fun. I had seen this before many times, and disappointed as I was in the members of my profession, I decided to keep quiet and keep running. But then, most of the children left and one of the young teachers, surrounded by three remaining students, lit up a cigarette. That was the proverbial last straw!

I stopped in mid-run and asked her if she was indeed a physical education teacher. She answered affirmatively and puffed away. I asked her how she could smoke in front of her charges. Her answer? "Ani b'hafsaka." (I'm on my break.) Her response was so shattering to me that my run stopped there and then, as did my day's joy.

There was no need for me to lecture her on emulative models, leadership and teaching-by-showing. She missed the whole point. Some people should never attempt brain surgery and others should stay away from the classroom!

Soon after that incident, we lost the whole track to more misguided values when the government decided to stage a Yom Ha'atzmaut show for the Jewish State's 50th anniversary on the site of the Givat Ram 440.

What a disaster that was for the State, the Jewish people and Zionism. The show was mismanaged, mis-staged, and poorly planned. It aggravated many of the tensions present in Israeli society and was highly criticized by almost every element of that same fragile structure. To make it all worse, the track was ruined forever: bulldozed, littered with scrap metal and boulders.

Those two incidents came to symbolize for me the current state of Zionist values: teachers teaching one thing and doing another, and politicians who have lost touch with the true fabric of the society they serve. Please note that I make no mention of right or left, religious or secular, Ashkenazi or Sephardi. As many educators, writers and other observers have already noticed, these are not the issues, but rather the most superficial symptoms of problems that run much deeper.

While post-Zionism as a term is usually used to depict a lesser set of values that have replaced a glorious Zionist past, it can also be used to both describe and prescribe a new revolution that has begun in Israel. That was confirmed for me on this Pesach trip at my old running track.

Some of the very politicians who had destroyed that old track had obviously repented of their sin and built a new state-of-the-art Olympic track with all of the facilities needed for track and field sports.

My wife and I were pleased to see that the public could access it. The amateurs were back and with them a new cadre of Russian coaches and trainers. As I ran my miles, I saw some of the best teaching I have ever witnessed. I saw that rare combination of deep knowledge, pure pedagogic technique and love of the sport that make for a model any child can respect. The work was hard and demanding, but the smiles of achievement were evidence of true enjoyment. I heard a loud tov me'od (very good) and a clearer ochen charasho (very good), but I also heard critique and instruction given with respect and expectation.

Given my past work with the Joint Distribution Committee in Siberia, I was especially proud that this positive educational experience was mostly a Russian expression of post-Zionist values.

So, in the midst of a new intifadah, I saw every reason to hope for a better Israel striving to deal with the problems from within and without.

You may ask why a Jewish educator like myself has not mentioned Jewish texts, Hebrew, Jewish history and religion, but instead has gone on and on about sports and running tracks. My answer is because you don't teach Jewish values as a separate subject. In the same way that you best learn a second language by learning something else in that language, you learn the best values by practising them in the context of daily life.

New Russian immigrants were on that track along with children of veteran Israelis, Ashkenazim, Sephardim, some people wearing kippot, some wearing tattoos. Heavily armed soldiers a few metres away were guarding a picnic site for the holidays. It was all there in context, but the right teachers in such a well-built classroom put it all in the perspective it needed.

Above is a scene from the troubled 50th Yom Ha'atzmaut celebration at the Givat Ram track referred to by the author. To the left are scenes of Zionist experiences that express classic Zionist values — teaching Hebrew in Moscow in 1990 and a group of youngsters waiting in 1991 for the plane which carried them from the FSU to a new home in Zion.

Complicated or simple?

David Devor (son of Mildred and the late Johnny) sent me the following under the headline, "Pocket Guide to the Middle East Conflict." It reads as follows:

Rabbi Gunther Plaut in Toronto

One of the most common truisms on earth holds that the Middle East conflict is "complex" and hard to understand. It is not.

There are two and only two "theories" of the Middle East conflict. Let us call them A and B. Most of the world believes A, whose popularity has only grown over time.

Theory A holds that there is a Middle East conflict because the Jews are bad people and are mean to the Arabs and that they mistreat the Arabs and deny them their rights.

Theory B holds that there is a Middle East conflict because the Arabs seek to destroy Israel.

The world used to believe in Theory B. The Israeli political establishment and even the Israeli Zionist Left used to believe in B.

Starting in the early 1980s, the Israeli political establishment shifted from B to A, starting with the left and followed by the centre and even parts of the right. So did most of the American Jewish establishment.

If you believe in A, you think Israel needs to pursue peace through self-depreciation. If you believe in B, you think Israel needs to pursue peace through self-assertion.

If you believe in A, you think Israel must pursue peace by making concessions. If you believe in B, you think Israel needs to pursue peace by not making concessions.

If you believe in A, you think Israel needs to pursue peace by using less force. If you believe in B, you think Israel needs to pursue peace by using more force.

If you believe in A, you think Israeli settlements are an, indeed the, obstacle to peace. If you believe in B, you think Arab ambitions to destroy Israel are the only obstacle to peace.

If you believe in A, you think Oslo failed because it was not pursued vigorously enough. If you believe in B, you think Oslo failed because Theory A is wrong.

Theory A is false and Theory B is correct.

This is the end of forwarded message.

Would the argument have equal strength if, at the end, we were told that proposition A is right? I happen to believe that both propositions must be given due consideration. However, I am an observer from afar; Prime Minister Ariel Sharon is Israel's elected leader and he agrees with proposition B.

Canadian thoughts on Yom Ha'atzmaut

Yom Ha'atzmaut, Israel's Independence Day, will soon be at hand. For me, during my elementary day school years, it meant wearing blue and white to school, spending time eating falafel, and enjoying many other Israeli themes that made the day different – and much more fun – than any others.

Darcie Richler in Halifax

I was fortunate to experience Israel firsthand in 1988. My parents decided to take our family there to celebrate my sister's upcoming bat mitzvah, and it was perhaps the best way to educate me about Israeli history and culture. The few weeks that we spent in Israel on that trip opened up my eight-year-old mind to a vibrant country, a place to connect with.

My parents' goal was to find a way to captivate me and my siblings and teach us about this wonderful place, and, to say the least, they hooked us all in.

When I went to Israel on a more extensive trip in 1997, the ideals that the first visit had taught me were reinforced. Travelling through the country again for a longer amount of time, I was able to define a place for Israel in my mind.

For parents contemplating sending their teenaged children to Israel on a trip, if you have a couple of days, I could give you many reasons why you should indeed do so! An essential one would be to make an imprint that we have an obligation to Israel. (People will likely find their "niche of connection" to ensure that they stay involved.)

As a Canadian, it has been hard for me to see things through the eyes of an Israeli this year. We take a lot for granted here and tend to forget how difficult things have been in the region in recent months. I support Israel and the position it has taken recently, yet I often wonder what it must be like to actually be living there at a time like this.

In Canada, we can sing and dance on Yom Ha'atzmaut. We can spend the day any way we like and return to regular life the next day. Most Canadians take their own independence for granted. In Israel, however, this year's Independence Day might be a little different from some others. With the bloodshed on both sides this year, it will be hard for many to rejoice.

Our thoughts in the Diaspora about Israel's independence this year will be bittersweet when we thinks of the continuing human cost. It is more important than ever for us as Canadians to show our support in any way we can, in this time of uncertainty.

For me this year, I will be thinking about a brother-in-law's brother who is now serving in miluim, the one-month-a-year reservist call-up. While I sit here and do as I please, he will be thinking of his wife and young child from a distance, so that he can defend his country. Although he had no choice about working in the army for a month, he would do it no matter what. Most of us cannot imagine putting our lives in danger for anything, yet Israeli citizens must do so, for something bigger than themselves.

Israel's Independence Day has changed for us. From now on, aside from celebrating the day, we need to find ways to renew and expand our commitment to Israel. I think that for everything that has been done for those of us who were able to visit Israel, it is the very least that we can do.

Am Yisrael chai.

Winnipeg's youth hit the airwaves

Some members of the Jewish community here are undertaking a new initiative to get young people involved by using the radio to give community information and Hebrew rock 'n' roll a place on Winnipeg's airwaves.

Bryan Borzykowski in Winnipeg

After the death of Yiddishist Noah Witman, the voice of the Jewish community here became a little quieter, but some of us decided to keep Witman's Jewish Hour up and running, even if we had to run the programs themselves. This is, in fact, exactly what has happened. Every week, a different person hosts the Jewish Hour, and now some young people are getting involved, too.

I am very excited at the prospect of a radio program aimed at Jewish youth. I have written about the struggle to get students involved in JSA and other projects in the community, but I think that radio has limitless potential. If young people were to turn on the radio station as they were driving to school or to hockey or to go shopping, and hear Aviv Geffen, or maybe the alternative tunes of Dr. Kasper, they would instantly get a taste of something Jewish and something they have never been exposed to. At the same time, community events can be discussed and important issues can be brought to light. All it would take would be one car ride to learn valuable information about Jewish culture and life.

The main problem with this is that virtually no one in my age group has any idea that there is a Jewish Hour, let alone a cultural radio station in Winnipeg. I didn't know the station existed until about a month ago. I am left wondering why the community has not embraced the Jewish Hour and if they ever really will. In the weeks when the program is not run by youth, interesting programs, with music ranging from cantorial selections to klezmer tunes, are proudly produced.

With a Jewish program that has the potential to reach hundreds of listeners, it amazes me that the Jewish community is not taking a stronger approach. There is no publicity for this station, and as a result, no one knows what CKJS is, or that there is a station at 810 on the AM dial.

I would like to see more people aware of this program, but it is hard to do this when you don't have the community support that many other Jewish organizations do. Maybe the community is just apathetic to a new initiative, but it is not hard to see that this station, with all of its potential, will fail if no one is listening or supporting it.

I think one way to help this station succeed is by word of mouth. So far, we have had one youth-oriented show, but hopefully something more consistent can be worked out. Ideally, the grandparents who usually listen to this station will tell their grandchildren about it.

So I call on all the young adults (or anyone else) who read The Canadian Jewish News, for help. First, is there something else like this out there, and if there is, what format does that show take? And to everyone, if you were to listen to a Jewish radio program, what would you want to hear? What issues are pressing that need to be discussed? Furthermore, I really need names of good Israeli bands (or Jewish bands) that could be played on the show. I have a lot of ideas as to what should go into the program, but I think it is important to get the input of a variety of people (and what better variety than people all across Canada?) to really make a great production.

This radio program will hopefully become the talk of the community, and with a little support and an increased listenership, we will be able to tap into a medium that can bring Jewish arts and news into your car or your living room. For the Winnipeggers out there, tune in to the Jewish Hour every Sunday from 1:30 to 2:30 p.m. on 810 AM.

Wartime massacre in Poland stirs debate

With the appearance of Neighbors, Jebwabne, a remote town in northern Poland, has suddenly emerged from obscurity. Originally published in Polish last May, this chilling book recounts an almost forgotten 1941 massacre of Polish Jews.

Sheldon Kirshner in Toronto

What is so unusual about this atrocity is that it was perpetrated not by Germans but by Poles. Poland, having been conquered by Germany in 1939, suffered terribly at the hands of the Nazis. Poles, understandably enough, regard themselves as victims.

But with the publication of Neighbors, written by Jan Tomasz Gross, a Polish-born New York University political scientist, Poland's wartime self-image has been tarnished. In Neighbors, now available in an English-language edition published by Princeton University Press, the Poles are the perpetrators, the cold-blooded beasts who murdered some 1,600 Jews in a calculated orgy of unbridled violence, while the Germans are the malevolent bystanders.

That ordinary Poles could have stooped so low and clubbed, knifed and burned to death Jewish men, women and children should not be surprising. Pogroms in modern-day Poland, which gained independence in 1918, were not exactly unusual. Think of those that rattled Polish Jews in the wake of World War 1, during the inter-war period, and immediately after 1945. The record speaks for itself.

But until Neighbors came along with a resounding thud, Poles had never been implicated in the mass murder of Jews during the Nazi occupation. We know that Poles, in that dark era, betrayed Jews. We also know that still other Poles risked their lives and that of their families to help Jews. But the heartless massacre Gross methodically documents in Neighbors, largely dry stylistically, is like a bolt out of the blue, an indelible stain that discolours the fabric of Polish history and forces Poles to come to terms with an ugly facet of their past.

As a matter of accuracy, the terrifying events in Jebwabne actually came to light more than 50 years ago, but were overlooked by the media.

Szmul Wasersztejn, one of the seven survivors, provided the first eyewitness account of the massacre in a 1945 deposition. As a result of his testimony, the murderers were brought to trial in 1949. Twelve of the defendants were given fairly lenient prison sentences, from eight to 15 years, and one man was condemned to death, but the sentence was never carried out.

In 1980, former Jewish residents of Jedwabne compiled a memorial book about their vanished Jewish community. It, too, left little of an impact. Last April, however, the incendiary issue caught fire with the screening of a searing documentary about Jedwabne by Polish filmmaker Agnieszka Arnold. This was followed by a series of front-page articles in the mass-circulation daily newspaper Rzeczposolita that lay bare the infamy. Shortly afterward, Neighbors was launched at the International Book Fair in Warsaw.

Neighbors has triggered a nation-wide furore in Poland. Poland's president, Aleksander Kwasniewski, having described the pogrom as "an act of genocide," has promised to apologize for it at a ceremony in July. Jozef Cardinal Glemp has called for a thorough investigation of "the causes of such barbaric and hateful attitudes of Poles toward Jews."

Since then, the Polish government has removed a memorial plaque in Jedwabne that blamed the massacre on the Germans, excavated the sites where the Jews were killed, and pledged to investigate the incident.

Gross, who left Poland in 1968 after the outbreak of an anti-Semitic campaign orchestrated by the government, stumbled upon Wasersztejn's deposition in Warsaw's Jewish Historical Institute by sheer coincidence. "I was immediately struck by it...unable to comprehend its full meaning," he said in a recent interview in The New Yorker. "This was out of scale...beyond all we knew so far about the war."

Jedwabne, northeast of Warsaw, lies in a picturesque region of Poland intersected by two river valleys. In 1931, judging by census figures, the population was 2,167, of whom 60 percent were Jewish. Many of its Jewish inhabitants earned a livelihood as craftsmen.

On Sept. 1, 1939, the Wehrmacht invaded Poland, briefly occupying Jedwabne. In compliance with Germany's non-aggression pact with the Soviet Union, German troops withdrew from Jedwabne, leaving it to the tender mercies of the Red Army, which had swept into eastern Poland on Sept. 17.

Poles, in anger and resentment, generally claim that Jews welcomed the Soviets enthusiastically. Gross begs to differ, contending that overzealous Jewish support of the Soviets was not "a widespread phenomenon."

Since Jews comprised 60 percent of the local populace, they were employed in the new regime's administration and in state-run factories and co-operatives. Top-level positions were entrusted to Soviet citizens.

In any case, Poles felt the brunt of the Soviet occupation, Gross acknowledges. Members of the Polish elite were arrested or deported. Private property was expropriated. Religious institutions and churches, as well as synagogues, were closed.

Poles greeted the Wehrmacht quite warmly when it marched into Jedwabne on June 23, 1941. Jews, fearing the Nazis far more than the Bolsheviks, lay low. They had reason to be frightened. Within a day of entering Jedwabne, the Germans ordered Jews to burn holy books and Torahs, and tolerated a reign of terror against Jews.

"From this day on a horrible chain of suffering and torments began for the Jews," Wasersztejn said in his deposition. "Poles were the main tormentors, as they mercilessly beat (Jews)."

Gross is uncertain where the initiative to kill the Jews came from, the Germans or the Poles, but he is convinced that the pogrom would not have occurred without a Nazi presence. Having made this observation, Gross argues that it was co-ordinated by the town's mayor, Marian Karolak. "He is certainly the evil spirit of this tragedy," he writes.

On the morning of July 10, the Gestapo met with Karolak and members of the town council. When the Germans were asked what plans they had in store for the Jews, they replied unanimously that they must all be killed. Gross speculates that sheer anti-Semitism, as well as material greed, motivated the pogromists, Hitler's willing executioners. He also tells us that the Jedwabne massacre was preceded by pogroms in the nearby towns of Radzilow and Wasosz, but they are mentioned only in passing.

After this meeting, the bloodbath in Jedwabne was unleashed. Local hooligans, armed with axes, knives and clubs studded with nails, went on a rampage. In one instance, they ordered 75 of the youngest and healthiest Jews to lift a huge monument of Vladimir Lenin the Soviets had erected in the centre of the town. Under a rain of horrible blows, they carried it to a designated place. There they were butchered and thrown into a pit along with the statue.

The vast majority of Jews were herded into a barn. Wasersztajn, in his testimony, said: "Then the barn was doused with kerosene and lit, and the bandits went round to search Jewish homes to look for the remaining sick and children. The sick people they found they carried to the barn themselves, and as for the little children, they roped a few together by their legs and carried them on their backs, then put some of them on pitchforks and threw them onto smouldering coals. After the fire they used axes to knock golden teeth from still not entirely decomposing bodies."

Wasersztejn, his brother and five other Jews survived the pogrom. They were saved by two Polish farmers, Antonina and Aleksander Wyrzykowski, who lived in the hamlet of Janczewko. The couple hid the fugitives for almost three years, providing them with food and shelter.

Gross believes that the story of the Jebwabne pogrom would have receded from memory had the Wyrzykowskis not hidden Wasersztejn. But their good deed did not go unpunished. In the aftermath of the war, the Wyrzykowskis were hounded out of Janczewko. After Aleksander's death, Antonina immigrated to the United States.

Gross does not believe that the Jedwabne pogrom was indicative of Polish behaviour during the war. "This was not representative of a wider trend," he told Time magazine recently.

It is clear, though, that the tragedy in Jedwabne has shorn Poland of its innocence and, perhaps, blackened its soul.

As Abraham Lincoln proclaimed in 1862, "We cannot escape history."

Gold urges Arafat to end campaign of violence

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Israel will not allow the Palestinians to convert their current campaign of violence into political gains, Dore Gold, Prime Minister Ariel Sharon's adviser, asserted last week.

Speaking from Jerusalem in a conference call with Canadian and American reporters, organized by a public relations firm in New York City, Gold reiterated Israel's position on this issue.

Israel, he declared, will not resume peace talks with the president of the Palestinian Authority, Yasser Arafat, unless he calls off the intifadah.

"The violence must come to an end. On this point, Israel must remain principled."

Gold, Israel's former ambassador to the United Nations, warned the Palestinians they will not soften up Israel by force. "We won't reward this violence with concessions."

Claiming that Palestinian residents of the West Bank and Gaza Strip are growing impatient with Israel's blockade, Gold said, "Arafat is gaining nothing from this policy of violence. It is a dead end for him."

Urging him to return to the negotiating table, Gold observed, "The only way out of the current morass is to come to a more limited agreement. It's what is doable."

He was referring to Sharon's preference for interim pacts rather than a final accord with the Palestinians, the option chosen by his predecessor, Ehud Barak.

Asked whether Sharon's offer of 42 percent of the West Bank was a sufficient enough incentive for the Palestinians to stop the intifadah, Gold replied: "Arafat understands that he needs a better situation for his people on the ground, and that he won't get what Barak offered."

At last summer's Camp David summit, Barak was reportedly ready to relinquish more than 90 percent of the West Bank and Gaza, among other concessions, in exchange for an end-of-conflict agreement with the Palestinians.

Gold argued that Israel cannot enter into final status discussions with the Palestinians because the gaps in their respective positions on such key issues as borders and refugees are still too wide.

"It's better to try for something more doable."

Warning the Palestinians not to equate the West Bank and Gaza with southern Lebanon, from which Israel withdrew unilaterally last May, Gold said that Israel will not vacate these areas under military pressure.

"Israel won't run away from this problem in exhaustion," he said, reminding reporters that the West Bank and Gaza are close to its population and industrial heartland.

Dore Gold

In a reference to Israel's incursion into the Gaza Strip after the Israeli Negev town of Sederot came under Palestinian mortar fire last week, Gold said Israel had no intention of reoccupying territory transferred to full Palestinian control under the Oslo peace process.

"Israel moved 800 metres to one kilometre into Area A to remove mortar positions," he said of the controversial raid following the mortar attack on Sederot.

Gold said that Israel had no alternative but to demolish Palestinian bases close to its border. "It's a situation no country can live with, and [it] will become worse if we ignore the attacks."

Accusing the Palestinians of crossing a "red line" by lobbing mortars into a city in Israel itself, Gold vigorously denied reports that the Israeli army had hastily withdrawn from a pocket in Gaza under American prodding.

Shortly after U.S. Secretary of State Colin Powell characterized Israel's raid as "excessive and disproportionate," Israel announced it would immediately pull out of a one square kilometre area it had captured 24 hours earlier.

Powell made the statement after an Israeli army commander suggested that Israel would hold the swath of land for "days, weeks and months."

Claiming that Israel had decided to withdraw before receiving Powell's message, Gold said the Bush administration, far from being hostile to Israel, has a fundamental understanding of Israel's refusal to negotiate under duress.

"The U.S. understands the overall situation we face...and who's behind the violence," he added.

Gold expressed confidence that the United States would help Israel, firstly by countering Arafat's strategy of trying to win concessions through violence and, secondly, by continuing to oppose the insertion of an international peacekeeping contingent in the West Bank and Gaza.

"We have firm American support on these two points," he said.

Describing Arafat as less than a perfect partner, Gold said he hopes he will change his ways and negotiate his differences with Israel by diplomatic means.

"With persistence, determination and patience, we can change Arafat's approach," he said after voicing disappointment that Arafat had not transformed himself into "a kind of Nelson Mandela."

Saying that Israelis face an onslaught of mortar and sniper attacks, as well as suicide bombings, Gold lambasted Arafat for having taken the "strategic decision" to ignite the intifadah.

He claimed Arafat escalated the uprising because Barak's response was not forceful enough.

Gold accused Arafat's security apparatus, particularly Force 17, of being behind the violence.

He said the Palestinians have fired 80 mortar rounds into Gaza and Israel so far.

In responding militarily to their mortar offensive, Israel tries not to harm innocent Palestinians, he noted.

Gold said Israel has no interest whatsoever in becoming embroiled in a regional war.

In a parting remark, he congratulated Canada for having voted against a recent United Nations proposal to convene the high contracting parties to the Fourth Geneva Convention.

Day, CA drop lawsuit threat against Raphael

By RON CSILLAG
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — The Canadian Alliance and leader Stockwell Day have quietly backed off from a threat of legal action against a prominent Toronto lawyer and Jewish activist over the latter's linking of Day to Holocaust deniers.

Last Nov. 6, three weeks before the federal election, Bert Raphael wrote a letter to the editor of the Toronto Star in which he called on Day to reassure the Jewish community that prominent Holocaust deniers, who were rumoured to have infiltrated the Alliance, had no place in the party.

Bert Raphael

In the letter, Raphael noted that Doug Christie, the Victoria lawyer who has defended several Holocaust deniers, "appears" to have infiltrated the Alliance and "apparently" endorsed Day for prime minister.

About a week later, Raphael received an aggressively worded letter from Toronto lawyer Jack Berkow, representing the Alliance and Day. The missive warned that Raphael had 48 hours to ensure that "defamatory and libelous" comments contained in the published letter were retracted, and that Raphael apologize "in a form acceptable to us."

Raphael wrote back saying he had no intention of asking the Star to retract his letter, nor of apologizing.

The Alliance and Day never responded, and the time window in which legal action can occur has elapsed.

"It's over and done with," Raphael told The CJN last week. "If nothing else, this shows [Day] has a total lack of conviction.

"You would think," he continued, that Day "would have learned" from an earlier debacle over a defamation suit launched by Alberta lawyer Lorne Goddard, which was eventually revealed to have cost Alberta taxpayers some $800,000.

Stockwell Day

Berkow had charged that the "clear implication" of Raphael's letter was that Christie "is an active supporter of Stockwell Day and the Canadian Alliance, and that by accepting Mr. Christie's support, Mr. Day has somehow associated himself with the Holocaust-denying views of some of Mr. Christie's former clients, such as Ernst Zundel and James Keegstra."

Those allegations "are completely false and have been thoroughly refuted on the public record."

Berkow went on to quote a letter Day had written to the National Post in which Day spoke out against racism, anti-Semitism, Western separatism and in support of bilingualism. Berkow also referred to an apology issued by the Vancouver Sun for a letter associating Day with hatemongers and racist educational materials.

Berkow argued that Day had courted and won Jewish favour across the country, adding, "It would in fact be accurate to say that Mr. Day is both privately and publicly pro-Jewish."

The exchange took place in the heat of last fall's election campaign, in which the federal Liberals were pummeled for having supported an anti-Israel resolution at the United Nations, while Day came out in support of the Jewish state and public funding for Jewish schools.

> 'Total lack of conviction'

But Raphael, a longtime advocate on behalf of Israel and local Jewish causes, is unimpressed.

"Who in their right mind, just before an election, would think of doing this over a letter to the editor?

"At least have the courage of your convictions, and follow up."

Alliance communications director Ezra Levant defended Day as having a "strong friendship" with the Jewish community, evidenced, he said, by the fact that Day is the only federal leader scheduled to address the national plenary of Canadian Jewish Congress next month.

Levant was quoted recently as saying he still believes Raphael's remarks were defamatory. Asked why, then, the Alliance did not pursue legal action, he said: "You don't go after a gnat with a sledgehammer. We have bigger fish to fry, like Jean Chrétien."

Toronto yeshiva bocher helps run Siberia seder

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — In the Western imagination, Siberia is a land of vast expanses, harsh exile and hard labour.

With the collapse of the Soviet Union, the stereotypes of Siberia may be receding but its isolation remains. For Jews living in the city of Irkutsk, about 5,000 km east of Moscow just north of the Mongolian border, you can't get much farther off the beaten track anywhere in the Former Soviet Union (FSU).

Set in the midst of the Siberian taiga, or forest, not far from Lake Baikal, Irkutsk is home to a Jewish community of 4,000. And like Jewish communities elsewhere in the FSU, the Jews of Irkutsk are enjoying something of a cultural renaissance as they freely explore their Jewish heritage unhindered by government harassment.

After 75 years of Communism, however, memory of Judaic traditions is somewhat vague, so like their co-religionists in many other cities of the FSU, the Jewish community was aided in celebrating Passover thanks to the efforts of students dispatched by the Lubavitch movement.

Mendy Zaltzman of Toronto along with Levy Wolovosov of Boston, travelled to Irkutsk to help the community prepare for Passover, conduct community seders and connect the local Jews to the wider Jewish world.

Irkutsk has an advantage over other Siberian communities, Zaltzman noted. It is home to the only synagogue in Siberia, which attracts 30 worshippers on Friday night and about 40 people for Shabbat daytime services.

The seders, held in a rented hall, were even more popular, with 250 participating the first night, 150 more attending on the second night. Seder-goers consumed matzot, grape juice, kosher fish, and meat shipped to the community from Moscow.

They followed the seder in Russian-language illustrated Haggadot provided by the Russian Jewish federation in Moscow. Few Irkutsk Jews understand Hebrew (some older community members speak Yiddish), so the seders were conducted with the assistance of a Russian translator. The crowd was mixed in age, with more young people attending on the second night, Zaltzman said.

Mendy Zaltzman (standing, right) and Levy Wolovosov meet a group of Jewish women in Irkutsk, Siberia.

Zaltzman, whose father heads the Russian Jewish community in Toronto, was struck by the Irkutsk Jews' lack of knowledge about Judaism.

"Most people really don't know anything," he said. "But they have a thirst" to expand their knowledge.

Zaltzman was peppered with questions about Jewish life in the Diaspora, including Toronto, and he observed that local Jews were familiar with the situation in Israel. Pictures of the Jewish State decorated the synagogue walls and the matzot they ate originated in Israel.

Despite the community members' lack of material possessions, "I didn't see a desire to leave Russia," he said, However, "they were all very interested to hear about Jewish life outside Russia."

Zaltzman was told the community experienced little in the way of anti-Semitism and they described a visit by Russian President Vladimir Putin six months ago to the new Jewish federation building in Moscow. The visit was a source of pride to Irkutsk Jews and they believed it signalled a real acceptance by the Russian leadership of the Jewish presence in Russia, Zaltzman was told.

Irkutsk, with a population of 650,000, was one of 365 cities in the FSU to hold community seders. Four hundred Lubavitch students, including his brother Zalman, were dispatched to assist in Passover celebrations in many of the cities, he said.

Irkutsk has held community seders for at least three years and the Joint Distribution Committee regularly aids the community with badly needed supplies like food and medicine, Zaltzman said.

Following his visit to Irkutsk, Zaltzman flew back to Moscow for a visit, where he and other black-coated Lubavitch students were harassed with shouts of "heil Hitler" about one block from Red Square.

He and other students also visited the town of Lubavitch in Belarus (formerly White Russia), where the third and fourth Lubavitch rebbes are buried.

Josephus: Roman or Jew?

Sunday, May 6, 2001 – 3:00 p.m.

Louis H. Feldman (Yeshiva University)
"Josephus and the Bible"

Tessa Rajak (University of Reading, England)
"Josephus in the Diaspora"

Once a celebrated, young military leader in the Judean Revolt against Rome, Josephus Flavius became a turncoat. Later living in exile in Rome, he wrote accounts of the wars in which he had fought and the history of the people to which he belonged. But which people was really his, the Jews or the Romans? Professors Feldman and Rajak will address that question and others in this symposium on Josephus, whose life in two worlds foreshadows some burning questions of contemporary Jewish life.

The lectures will take place in the Glendon Dining Hall, Glendon Campus, of York University, 2275 Bayview Avenue. (Parking in the upper lot, near the hall.)

The Wolinsky Lectures are sponsored by the Centre for Jewish Studies, the Faculty of Arts, and the Faculty of Education of York University in cooperation with the Toronto Board of Jewish Education. Inquiries: Tel: 416-736-5823; Fax: 416-736-5344; Email: michaelb@yorku.ca

Jewish Life

A comedic triumph

Paradise Park*, By Allegra Goodman, The Dial Press, $35.95

Sharon Spiegelman, the 21-year-old folkdancing, guitar-playing, long-haired, heroine-narrator of this clever comic novel is endearingly unpredictable, a free spirit in pursuit of enlightenment in its various forms. But she is also deceitful, manipulative, gullible and lazy.

Books
Bernard Baskin

The novel opens in Hawaii in the mid-1970s. Sharon has been abandoned here by her boyfriend with little more than a macramé bikini and a few meagre possessions.

One afternoon, on a whale-watching boat, Sharon is shaken by a mystical experience. "It was as if the whole ocean was sliding open" and there, underneath was a vision of God. In the wake of this epiphany, Sharon is goaded into seeking the life of the spirit.

Over the next two decades she samples a variety of paths to truth and redemption. At the Greater Love Salvation Church she is temporarily saved by the Scotch-Irish-Hawaiian-Japanese-Portuguese pastor. "I felt something; I really did," she says. "I felt all that mercy and all that love just surge through me, and I said, 'Yes!' and I said 'Yes!' again. I said, 'Yeah!!!' And I said, 'Yippee!'"

But the ecstacy is short-lived. Jesus was worth considering, but, she concludes, he must have his own failings; he is "still living with his father."

Sharon doesn't remain long at her next stop, the Consciousness Meditation Centre, where, in her frustration, she dresses down her monk mentor as an "anal-retentive control freak."

At the Martin Buber Temple, the rabbi, who has vanity car plates with the greeting SHALOHA and who is given to apt witticism ("some of my best Jews are friends," he quips at a Quaker meeting), offers her a job teaching dancing.

After these and other attempts to find meaning in New Age religions, she forsakes Hawaii and makes a pilgrimage to an Orthodox Jewish school in Jerusalem. There she troubles her teacher with constant and often irritating questions. "Will it be possible, since we've been studying milk and meat for so long, and since some of us are actually vegetarian anyway, to maybe have more dialogue on other subjects as well?"

At last, at 38, just as it seems that her myopic quest for God must fail, Sharon discovers her Jewish roots and the religious warmth of a chassidic sect in Brooklyn. She delves into her new faith with her usual aimless fervour but finds new vision and clarity. However, she is unable to completely reconcile the mystical life she craves with rules and regulations that get in the way of her free spirit.

In all of this, there is great opportunity for fun and satire, and Goodman, who writes with easy virtuosity, doesn't miss a trick. The novel is brilliantly crafted, rich in clever and astute touches and pitched perfectly in depicting a bewilderingly complex but utterly believable character.

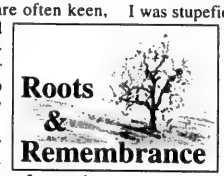
Readers, probing beneath the surface, will uncover serious concerns: the quest for religious meaning, the importance of familial ties, shifting and enduring values, the paradox of freedom within restraint.

Paradise Park is a bold step forward for the author, a comedic triumph and a worthy addition to her earlier, critically acclaimed works: Total Immersion, The Family Markowitz, and Kaaterskill Falls.

Postcards from the past

By ZE'EV GLICENSTEIN

A picture, according to the proverb, is worth a thousand words, but sometimes the power of a photograph to illuminate a setting seems to go well beyond the descriptive abilities of language. Genealogists are often keen, therefore, to find good generic photographs, illustrations and other visual materials to enhance their family tree research.



As defined by popular usage, a postcard is a tiny piece of vacation ephemera, purchased impulsively at a newsstand in a foreign destination, then dropped into a mailbox with a few scribbled bons mots, as a consolation to friends and loved ones at home.

Since interest in Jewish genealogy mushroomed in the last 25 years, postcards that depict Old Country scenes and places (synagogues, town halls, market squares, cemeteries) have become a much-valued and much-traded commodity.

In general, old postcards command increasingly respectable prices at antiquarian fairs and on the Internet. Prices have risen accordingly for postcards that depict quaint shtetl scenes or romanticized views of Jewish life.

Gerard Silvain, a Parisian collector of Jewish postcards, has presented a tremendously evocative assortment of postcards in Yiddishland, a small, thick, hardcover book published by California-based Gingko Press in 1999. As highlighted in Yiddishland, Silvain's presentation of Jewish postcards seems unsurpassed in quantity as well as quality.

"When, in 1964, for family reasons, I became interested in Judaic postcards, I was stupefied by the abundance and wealth of my discoveries," he writes. "I was immediately swept into an exploration which was as exhausting as it was exalting.

"Tirelessly, magnifying glass in hand, I rummaged through the bookstalls on the banks of the Seine, dusty bookshops, the Parisian flea markets, suburban junk sales and specialist salons. The mineral I extracted from these mines which I systematically exploited vein by vein resulted in a collection of several tens of thousands of Jewish postcards."

Yiddishland offers a rich cross-section of Silvain's collection under such categories as Vilna and Lodz; the street; restaurants, shops, trades; schools, hospitals, hospices, cemeteries; synagogues; and culture and politics.

Its pages are brimming with redolent images: children playing in the street, a kerchiefed woman selling hot soup in the market, a bearded Jew leading his tethered cow, a knife-grinder at his wheel, a pedlar selling prayer shawls door to door; and barbers, beggars, cobblers, porters, rabbis, schnorrers, stall-tenders, tailors, water-carriers.

In some pictures, the streets seem dirty and roughly cobblestoned, the houses dilapidated, the people impoverished and sad. But in others, the buildings and the people reflect prosperity and rootedness. Thus the book captures the diversity and contradictions of the shtetl.

To contact Gingko Press, phone 415-924-9615 or e-mail gingko@linex.com.

Avotaynu Inc., the genealogical publisher, offers electronic images in JPG format of a growing assortment of Jewish postcards. Upon visiting Avotaynu's Web site at www.avotaynu.com, one may preview an image in low resolution, then download a high-resolution replica for US $2.50 (minimum order US $10).

Genealogists, travellers and representatives of Jewish institutions may find The Jewish Year Book 2001 of interest. Published in association with the Jewish Chronicle and edited by Stephen W. Massil, the 376-page volume is a thorough regional compendium on British institutional Jewry, including synagogues, charities and many communal organizations.

Published by Vallentine Mitchell, the Year Book also offers a contemporary Who's Who of British Jewry, obituaries from the past year and numerous essays on different aspects of Anglo-Jewish history. A 60-page listing enumerates major Jewish organizations around the world by country, with capsule histories of the Jews for each country. The entry for Israel seems particularly strong.

Jewish Life

Hebrew educational sites

By MARK MIETKIEWICZ

Today, we continue our look at Hebrew on the Internet with some sites that will educate and even entertain while teaching you the language.

If you want to learn a little bit every day, then join the Hebrew Word of the Day mailing list [hebrewWord.listbot.com/]. You'll receive a regular e-mail containing a beginner word, an intermediate entry and a short translation of a Hebrew prayer. To learn more, click on the button to visit the Hebrew word archives and join in the online discussion group [www.hebrewresources.com/discus/].

If you would like to graduate from words to idioms and sayings, then click on the Jewish Agency's Passing Phrase Web site [www.learnhebrew.org.il/]. A sample phrase: kol hakavod, which means great job. Here's their cheeky explanation: "Your kid hits a home run; you would praise him/her with 'Kol hakavod!' Of course, as with any other great phrase, it can also be used with a tinge of sarcasm: 'Kol hakavod' that you broke your leg/ shot your boss/ totalled your car/ all of the above." You can read and listen to more Israeli slang at the about.com Web site [hebrew.about.com/homework/hebrew/library/slang/blslangindex.htm].

Israeli Hebrew for Speakers of English is a series of Hebrew language textbooks designed by a group of linguists and Hebrew instructors at the University of Illinois. Even if you don't purchase the textbooks, you can still learn from the 21 audio lessons provided free on the Internet [dubenbooks.freeyellow.com/israeli_hebrew_audio.htm]. These lessons last up to 40 minutes; be prepared to be drilled on grammar, pronunciation and comprehension. They start with the basics but get quite sophisticated. In order to hear these lessons, you will need to have the RealPlayer Basic program installed on your computer. It can be downloaded free from the Real site [www.real.com/player/].

If you have an interest in Hebrew, there's a discussion group that wants you as a member. For example, the Bilingual Hebrew group brings together people "who live in two cultures; those whose children speak a language which is different from the local parlance, and those who want to retain their own primary language." There are also discussion groups for people interested in Hebrew translating, Hebrew computing, Jewish writing, Jewish editing and joining an Ivrit Basic Hebrew Forum [www.geocities.com/athens/stage/4942/2Language.html].

There are many kids' educational Hebrew Web sites that make learning fun. Dr. Nurit and Dr. Yonatan Reshef have created the lovely Hebrew Survival Kit where you are challenged to match English and Hebrew phrases [www.bus.ualberta.ca/yreshef/zionism/Bahasa/hskindex.html]. As you click on the words, a voice speaks them. Stay on the Reshefs' site and you'll be quizzed to match Hebrew words with corresponding pictures [www.bus.ualberta.ca/yreshef/quizpicture/]. (You'll need Hebrew fonts installed to play this one.)

Do you remember those hand-held puzzles in which you scramble the tiles and then are challenged to rearrange them to form a picture? The Aleph-Bet Puzzle tests you to do the same thing online – by reordering the Hebrew alphabet [members.tripod.com/~rafistern/fun.html]. At the same site's Aleph-Bet Memory Game, you are challenged to remember letters of the Hebrew alphabet in the style of the old game show Concentration. Finally, the Multilingual Word Match Game not only tests your skills but even comes with an amusing guarantee: "Become a polyglot in minutes or your money back!" [www.bus.ualberta.ca/yreshef/wordmatch/wordmatch.html]

Don't miss ZigZag's Hebrew for Me page [www.zigzagworld.com/hebrewforme/]. You can choose from 17 different scenes, such as at the restaurant, shopping for Shabbat and what do I wear? When you drag a Hebrew word from the side of your screen onto the scene, the Hebrew words turn into an explanatory picture. The more creative your design, the more Hebrew words you learn.

While at this Web site, adults will be suitably challenged by the frustrating AlefBetGo game [www.zigzagworld.com/AlefBetGo/]. Society may influence customs

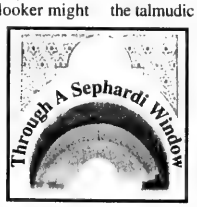
By RABBI YEHIEL BEN AYON

General society can exert a great deal of influence on religious custom. This curious force is one that both creates customs and abolishes them.

There are items in the Sephardi rite that to a non-Sephardi onlooker might seem Jewishly out of place; for example, candles or oil lamps lit at home or in the synagogue on behalf of someone who is ill or otherwise in distress, items that are commonplace to us. Also, near the conclusion of every synagogue prayer service (excluding Shabbat), a collection plate is passed around for alms. A men's or boys' choir will often accompany, if not lead, parts of the prayers. Weddings at the "altar" for Sephardim are de rigueur.



Naturally, for someone not exposed to this, it sounds a bit "churchy." However, all these customs are venerable, ancient and quintessentially Jewish in nature.

Unfortunately, the fact that the Catholic faith adopted these Jewish practices as their own has, ironically, contributed to their demise, as Jews began to discard them. Prior to the spread of Catholicism these customs were the norm. This is evident from the time of the talmudic writings on.

The reasoning was simple – the line between the Jew and his neighbour was being blurred by all the similarities. Clearer demarcation was needed.

Hence Ashkenazi Jews gave up these customs. Traditionally, they would not marry in the synagogue but under the stars. The same is true for the lighting of candles – save for Shabbat candles. This too has long since stopped being a custom that is practised.

The neighbour of the Sephardi, however, was not Catholic but Muslim. Hence these practices never changed, for their Jewish identity was never challenged.

Another such example is the hiloula. During these days of the Omer, or, as the Sephardim like to say Sefirah, two days are especially marked. They are the dates of the passing of two first-century sages – Rebbe Meir Baal Hanes and Rebbe Shimon Bar Yochai. On these respective anniversaries, Sephardim gather, study and recount the lives and wonders of these sages, feasting and lighting candles. This is known as a hiloula.

There are many hiloulot throughout the year, each one marking the time of the passing of great and pious sages. Regions, towns and even families would choose for themselves a particular tzaddik to venerate, annually and lavishly marking the date. A lifelong spiritual relationship would be forged between the individual and the tzaddik.

Again, this concept may bring to mind the Catholic ideal of observing the days of patron saints. But in the Sephardi world, untouched by Catholic influences, this is a non-issue.

At a traditional hiloula, there will be music, food and flowers; arak will flow freely along with toasts of l'chaim. Candles and even bonfires will glow. A hiloula is an integral part of the yearly Sephardi calendar. It is a sacred celebration of faith and of life.

Tales from the FUNWALK

UJA FEDERATION's upcoming ISRAEL FUNWALK 2001 on Victoria Day, Monday, May 21st is an opportunity for our community to express its solidarity with Israel.

Organizers are urging every member of the community to "WALK WITH ISRAEL," on May 21, which is also YOM YERUSHALAYIM - JERUSALEM DAY - the day on which Jerusalem was unified.

"Just by being at the FUNWALK, you'll be demonstrating support for Israel at a very difficult time," stresses Abe Glowinsky, who is co-chairing the event with Elyza Polsky. "Participating in the FUNWALK takes little effort, but it makes a major statement about solidarity with Israel,"adds Polsky. "And you'll have a lot of fun at the same time."

This year's FUNWALK also features a BLUE RIBBON CAMPAIGN on behalf of three Israeli soldiers kidnapped several months ago by Hizbullah terrorists.

UJA FEDERATION will be distributing blue ribbons for participants to wear, and with up to 10,000 participants expected, the streets of downtown Toronto will be a sea of blue on behalf of Israel and its missing soldiers.

Not only can FUNWALK participants wear their ribbons in support of Israel, they can even help create them!

What a great way to be directly involved in a project to benefit Israel.

Anyone 13 or older is invited to come to UJA FEDERATION's headquarters at 4600 Bathurst Street on any or all of the dates listed below to assemble the final product.

Why not make it a family affair?

Taback helped many Jewish immigrants

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — An immigrant herself at a young age, Tobie Taback had tremendous compassion for the clients she helped through her work at Jewish Immigrant Aid Services (JIAS), where she began as a secretary in the mid-1940s, and retired as assistant executive director of the agency two decades ago.

Obituary

Taback, who died in her sleep on April 10 at age 83 at Scarborough Grace Hospital, was "a special lady" who was full of energy, said Maurice Benzacar, a colleague of hers for 17 years until her retirement.

Her specialty was in appealing refugee cases, particularly when one family member was denied entry to Canada because of illness, said Benzacar, who came here from Morocco in 1957, but did not deal directly with Taback at that time.

"She would do everything possible to appeal to Ottawa. When she was dictating a letter, there were tears coming out of her eyes," recalled Benzacar. "She helped many, many people to settle."

Taback was "an expert on all the immigration laws you would need to know about – and how to bend them a little in order to bring people in," said Morris Adams, a former JIAS president. "If anybody was made for the job, she was." Taback had a good rapport with the Department of Immigration, he added. "They respected her."

Although "people only came to her with problems," she was the type that people were "happy to be with," Adams recalls. "She was quite a personality...The Jewish community – and particularly JIAS – was lucky to have her."

A native of a small town near Odessa, Taback moved with her younger sister and their parents David and Schifra to the vicinity of Bucharest before immigrating in the early 1920s to Toronto, where David had a dry goods store on Queen Street.

As a teenager, Taback, who spoke more than half a dozen languages, worked as a Hebrew teacher at Talmud Torah, which eventually became Associated Hebrew Schools. Later in life, Taback served on the school's board of governors and a number of other committees.

Her nephew and only surviving close relative, David London, remembers Taback's good nature, sense of humour, consideration for others, and desire to develop emotionally and intellectually, even in her later years and despite health problems that restricted her mobility. "She struck me as childlike in the best sense – full of wonder for things around her."

Taback, who never married, lived most of her life with her only sibling, Fay London, who predeceased her in 1998. David London moved back at one point to take care of the two sisters, and Taback lived with him and his wife until she (Taback) was hospitalized following a recent stroke.

Landy to be new CJC president tremendous growth in Jewish community organizations, all of whom are vying for attention, and that is a good thing. It keeps everyone on their toes. Our mandate is to do good deeds and try to make the world a better place.

"[I do not want] to paint too rosy a picture, however. We have to recognize our divisions, whether they are political or religious, and provide a method of conversing [to close] the divide. I see Congress as playing the role of neutral third party, in order to bring parties of differing views together. We have always been able to achieve that, and we want to continue doing so."

There are various issues, he said, that are specific to certain areas of the country. "Toronto is not the centre of the universe. There are thriving communities outside of Toronto that are wonderful, warm and welcoming. It is important for Congress to be seen as a community organization that speaks for the community."

As the father of a 20-year-old and a 17-year-old, Landy said we must be constantly on guard against the "so-called messianic movement that is really a vile attempt to turn Jews away from their religion.

"They prey upon the weak – those with the least knowledge of Judaism as a living religion. It is important to engage youth in our community. Our religion has so much to offer, that they do not have to search elsewhere. Judaism can satisfy even the most voracious appetite."

Canadians must also remember that they do not live in isolation. "We have brothers and sisters who are oppressed elsewhere, and we are proud constituent partners with others in World Jewish Congress who have done so much in Holocaust restitution."

His proudest moment as Ontario chair of CJC, Landy said, was the passing of the Yom Hashoah Holocaust Memorial Day Act. "When the survivors are gone, what will be left are those aspects of the terrible evil that was the Holocaust.

"Students now have Holocaust studies included in their curriculum, and we are still fighting to have a Holocaust museum in Ottawa."

CJC's agenda is large, said Landy, "and although I am daunted by the whole thing, I am very excited. I am at the point where I am willing to take on the task, and I am honoured to do so.

"There is a great group of capable officers as well as a dedicated staff. The staff members are the real servants of the Jewish people," said Landy.

What will his family life be like once both he and his wife take office? "Thank goodness for Shabbat," he said.

Jewish students hold Yom Hashoah ceremony

CHAT students organized a Yom Hashoah ceremony at Beth Emeth Synagogue. [Anna Morgan photos]

By ANNA MORGAN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — While some students chanted the names of Holocaust victims and the concentration camps where they died, more than 1,200 others marched through a narrow hallway to fill the Beth Emeth sanctuary.

In a one-hour Yom Hashoah ceremony, organized by the Community Hebrew Academy of Toronto, students remembered "back to when the world shut all its doors."

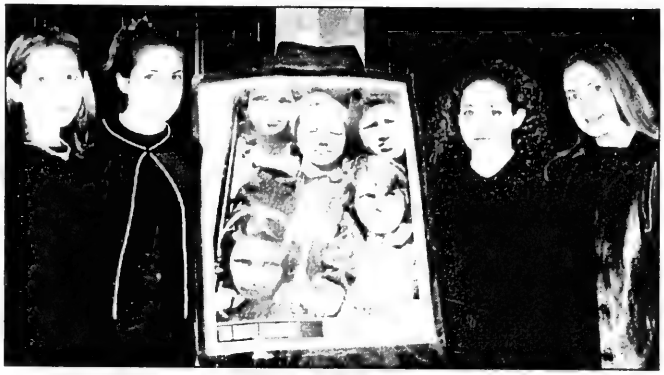
The program, titled Ani Maamin, which was written and produced by Gila Ashtor, used survivors' stories to transport the students back to the lives of prewar Eastern European Jews.

While voices sang the haunting melody of Ani Maamin, narrators described stories of mothers who gave up their babies in the hope that they would survive.

They described the fates of children massacred by Dr. Joseph Mengele in Auschwitz because the black line he drew was too high for them to reach.

As the faces of the young and old, those who perished and those who survived, were projected onto a screen, the narrators emphasized how important it is for this generation to remember – to avenge the men, women and children who were murdered and burned in all the camps of destruction.

"Those who fail to learn their history are doomed to repeat it," one narrator said.



One girl said that when her zayde, who was a survivor, died, his Jewish books were set aside. CHAT principal Paul Shaviv noted that it is our duty not to push those books aside.

"We must take those books," Shaviv said, "read and rewrite them for each generation."

Yom Hashoah is the single most important event in this school each year, Shaviv said. "Who would have believed that 50 or 60 years after the war, so many students would come together to remember and reflect on the Holocaust?

"The recent rankings of schools seems so unimportant when compared to the real purpose of our school as we see it today."

In the CHAT family, it is irrelevant whether you are good or bad in school, whether you skip classes or not, or whether you achieve the highest grades, Shaviv said.

"What is really important is that each one of you is here today. That is a precious gift."

These Israelis were murdered for a reason.
Like doing car pool, going for pizza or sleeping in mommy's arms.

Most victims did not live in areas of violent clashes. Rather, they were from cities like Tel Aviv, Beersheba, and Netanya.

Many of them were recent Jewish immigrants who came to Israel to escape the oppression of the former Soviet Union or the ravages of war-torn Ethiopia. All of them were murdered since September 27, 2000.

There must be an unequivocal political response. Our goal is to facilitate a personal response.

The Israel Emergency Solidarity Fund was established to help the families struck by the recent wave of terrorism in Israel. We met with many of the bereaved families throughout Israel. They are grateful that you share their pain. We'd like to offer ways to go beyond that.

Send a condolence note to a parent. Be a pen pal to an orphan. Organize those in your House of Worship or community center to do the same. Join in our Walk-A-Thons. Start your own. Or help alleviate the cost of anything from crisis counseling to summer camp.

And for the hundreds who were wounded or left permanently disabled, you can help lessen their physical and emotional burden. Our administrative costs are privately funded, so all monies we collect directly benefit the families.

Shira Ottawa Choir to attend Zimriya festival in Israel

By DIANE KOVEN
Ottawa Correspondent

OTTAWA — The Shira Ottawa Choir, in existence less than two years, will be one of only two North American choirs represented at Israel's Zimriya choir festival this summer.

The Zimriya has been held every three years since 1952, attracting participants from around the world. In 1998, more than 1,000 participants from 17 countries performed. For a fledgling choir such as Shira Ottawa to be chosen is quite remarkable.

Shira Ottawa, a program of the Soloway Jewish Community Centre, was conceived and organized by Ottawa cantor Daniel Benlolo, the dynamic and talented cantor of Congregation Beth Shalom West. Combining his own Moroccan heritage with his musical training and ability to meld various cultures and traditions, Benlolo has created a choir that is diverse and multicultural.

> 'Diversity is our nature; unity is our game'

"Diversity is our nature; unity is our game," says Benlolo.

He is proud that more than 50 people were attracted to the initial audition called at the JCC, and that the choir now consists of 60 members ranging in age from 15 to 75.

Age is only one area of diversity. Choir members come from all parts of the Jewish spectrum and beyond, Benlolo says.

"People who have no other connection to the Jewish community now have a connection through the choir," he says. "Members range from the totally unaffiliated, to Reform, Conservative, Orthodox and Reconstruction affiliations, as well as non-Jews who simply love to sing."

No particular expertise is required to join this choir. "We even give free workshops to teach people to read music," Benlolo says. "We also have outings and picnics… It is really a social group."

The choir's repertoire reflects its membership. They perform in Ladino, Spanish, Hebrew, English, Yiddish and French, and even throw in a few Broadway hits.

Invitations to perform have been keeping the choir busy. Beginning last June with a performance in Montreal at Quinzaine 2000, an annual celebration of Sephardi culture, Shira Ottawa has continued to make a name for itself locally.

In March, at the invitation of Deputy Prime Minister Herb Gray, Shira Ottawa performed for members of Parliament in the rotunda of the Parliament Buildings during anti-racism week. The choir has also performed at the National Library of Canada and will be travelling to Kingston to appear at the Yom Ha'atzmaut celebration on April 25.

Shira Ottawa has already produced its first CD, Az Yashir. Released in November 2000, its sales have exceeded all expectations.

On Sunday, May 13, Shira Ottawa will be performing at Agudath Israel Synagogue at a fund-raising event to raise money for the choir's trip to Israel this summer. The program will feature a medley of songs from the Broadway play Joseph and His Technicolor Dreamcoat and a song from The Prince of Egypt.

"The reason we chose the theme to be Joseph and His Technicolor Dreamcoat," says Benlolo, "is to show the many different colours of our choir."

For information about the concert or for tickets, contact the Soloway Jewish Community Centre at 613-798-1818 or Congregation Agudath Israel at 613-728-3501.

יורם עשה חפץ שוב

צלם הקולנוע והטלביזיה יורם פיינצקי עשה זאת שוב. בעד שצלם ממוצע חולם ליהנות פעם בחיים בפרס אגודת צלמי הקולנוע הקנדי, ליורם ווחי חפעם הרביעית...וכדי שלא יהיה ספק בליבכם שאין פה עניין של קשרים או טריקים אחרים, המועמד אינו מגיש את מועמדותו, אלא תחנת הטלוויזיה עשה זאת. במקרה שלו, תחנת "גלובל" סוברה שזה הקטע תחדשותי הכי טוב שצולם עבורם השנה. ולסרט המסוים שיכה השנה יש סיפור מיוחד משלו שמלמד מאיפה חומרים עשוי יורם: במהלך החורף האחרון עבר יורם ניתוח עין בעזרת קרני לייזר, והרופא הזהיר אותו שהשיפה לשמש עלולה להיות לא נעימה ואפילו כואבת. רוב האנשים שאני מכיר היו שוכבים בחושך איזה שבוע. אבל לא פיינצקי חס ושלום. הוא יוצא לעבודה למחרת היום ומצטרף לנהג מכונית גרר לצלם איך סערת השלג נראית בעיני נהג גרר, איך הוא מחלץ וגורר מכוניות שהתהפכו או נתקעו בשלג. וכך הוא מוצא את עצמו שש שעות בסופה, עם אור לבן חזק ורוח חזקה עד יותר. אבל למרות ההרגשה של סכין בתוך העין לא הפסיק יורם את מלאכתו. חפרטים והלה לא היו ידועים לחבר השופטים. הם גם כנראה לא ידעים שמדובר במישהו שגדל בקונאדו חימי, ושאחרי שנמר את תואר החדשות בטכניון וחליט להיות צלם קולנוע. קשה להשוב על סיוט יותר גדול מזה לחורים פולנים, אבל חורים של יורם וארכיו ימים לראות אותו מצליח בגדול. או חרבה איחולים ליורם, וששיאר ביעו.

מאיפה אתה- אאת קלי'

ברוב המקרים זוהי שאלה ידידותית שמטרתה שבירת הקרח כאשר אנו מתודעים לאנשים חדשים. ואולם השאלה עלולה להיות עיתית, תלוי בזהותו של הנשאל, השואל, טון השאלה והסיטואציה שבה נשאלת השאלה. ומכיון שבאופן בסיסי אנו מתודעים לאנשים בסיטואציה חברתית או עסקית, חרי לפניכם שתי דוגמאות שבהן יכולה השאלה להיות עיתית.

בסיטואציה חברתית, אתה (מהגר במקור) מחכן למסיבה כשתרוב המוחלט של משתתפיה חם "ילידים". אתה מנסה להשתלב בשיחה, סביב דיעה, אך במקום לקבל תגובה עניינית, אחד המשתתפים (ילד) שואל אותך במפגיע מאיפה אתה. אין ספק שבמקרה זה השאלה עיתית ומטרתה היא להעמיד אותך על מקומך ולהודיע לך קבל עם ועדה שזוהותך הזרה בולטת, ובמקרה שכזה זאת, השאלה מאיפה אתה תשמש לך כתזכורת. מה עשיתי אני פיתחתי את התגובה הבאה:

ילד: מאיפה אתה?

אני: מטורונטו.

ילד: אני מתכוון לפני טורונטו.

אני: מוסקווה.

ילד: (מאבד את סבלנותו) אני מתכוון במקור!

אני: מישראל! (ומיד שואל בחזרה) ומאיפה אתה?

ילד: (בנדהמה על שלא זיהיתי אותו כילד) אני מכאן מדורי דורות!

אני: או כן, סליחה, באמת יש לך מבטא קצת אינדיאני...

בסיטואציה העסקית זה לא כל כך פשוט. השואל רוצה לקבוע את תוקי המשחק ולאכות ביתרון כבר בהתחלה, על ידי זה שתנדוזה שאתה זר. במקרה כזה נחוצה מצד אחד טקטיקה שלא תגביל לשבירת כלים, ומצד שני תחזיר אותך למצב שויון מחלחי. במקרה כזה אני ענה מיד ובלי התרחכויות במקור "אני מישראל" ומיד שואל " ומאיפה אתה במקור?". וכאשר השואל מזהה בבואות את מקום הולדתו אני ממשיך ומתעניין איך זה היה שם בילדותו. בשלב זה הוא מבין שחטריק שלו לא הצליח, והוא חותך לדון בעסקים. כמו שהאמר" דע מאיפה אתה ולאן אתה הולך".

Project Solidarity hopes to raise $100,000

By DAVID LAZARUS
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — With only days to get plans off the ground, the Montreal Jewish community is celebrating Yom Ha'atzmaut with a "loonie" grassroots celebration of solidarity with Israel.

Project Solidarity is asking all Montreal Jews – about 100,000 – to give $1 each – one loonie – as a gesture to counter the sense of helplessness felt in the wake of the six months of violence, said project participant Marc Gold.

The proceeds will go towards upgrading trauma facilities in Israel for victims of the violence.

The idea came only a few weeks ago during discussions among members of the community – among them McGill professor Gil Troy, Gold and Rabbi Chaim Steinmetz.

Privately paid-for full-page ads are running on Yom Ha'atzmaut in La Presse and the Gazette; Project Solidarity pushke boxes will be placed throughout the Jewish community to take the $1 donations; and blue and white solidarity ribbons will be distributed within the community.

Subsequent ads are to appear in The CJN and another weekly West-end publication.

Yom Ha'atzmaut celebration

Almost every synagogue, school, agency, institution and Israel-based organization was approached for the project and none declined, said Gold, who also chairs FEDERATION CJA's Kievskaya Project.

Project Solidarity is not a federation project, although it generously lent use of its resources, representatives say.

In an April 12 letter sent out to potential supporters, Rabbi Chananya Berzon, president of the Rabbinical Council of Canada, and Rabbi Steinmetz, president of the Montreal Board of Rabbis, called the project a "tremendous opportunity" for Montreal Jews to express their solidarity with Israel during a time of crisis.

Montreal is the first North American Jewish community to come up with the idea.

Rabbi Steinmetz said the project grew out of a sense of hunger in the community to do something, and that he would not be surprised if other Jewish communities in North America followed suit.

"People just want to do something in support of Israel," he said.

"There is a pent-up need, and this will tap into every member. We wanted to do something that was very basic and non-controversial. And every response has been: 'How can we help?'"

Gold said, "Our community has been anxious and struggling over how to respond [to the crisis]. We wanted to do something that was completely broad-based. This is an opportunity to affirm our love for Israel during tough times."

Rabbi Steinmetz said that the campaign will probably wind down by June.

Contributions will be accepted at most synagogues, Jewish organizations and institutions, and at community events such as the March to Jerusalem on May 20.

Project Solidarity organizers also held a special community-wide forum at the Gelber Centre to official launch the Project Solidarity campaign.

"Everybody can participate, and that's the key," Gold said. "It sounds like so simple an idea, but we [in Montreal] are definitely the first out of the box doing it."

Comic strip no laughing matter

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Jewish groups in Canada and the United States are up in arms over a syndicated cartoon that depicts a menorah morphing into a Christian cross.

The B.C. comic strip, which appeared in 1,300 publications around Easter, is offensive to Jews and suggests Judaism has been superseded by Christianity, spokespersons for the organizations say.

In the cartoon, penned by comic strip artist Johnny Hart, the candles on a seven-branched menorah are extinguished panel by panel as gospel passages are cited. The words "it is finished" remain in the last panel as the menorah's seventh candle goes out. The menorah's branches are stripped away to reveal a Christian cross.

"Essentially, the message is that Judaism has been extinguished as a religion and Christianity has replaced it," said Manuel Prutschi, national director of community relations for Canadian Jewish Congress.

"That's the message that has been promoted for quite a number of centuries. Lately the mainstream Christian churches have rejected it."

The comic strip's message "is reminiscent of the theology of contempt, which for centuries played a central role in fomenting Christian violence and hatred against Jews," said Anti-Defamation League spokesperson Abraham Foxman in New York.

"It is even more troubling because the comic strip appear[ed] during Passover, a season that Christianity had historically used as an excuse to defame the Jewish religion with charges of blood libel, Jews as 'Christ-killers' and pogroms."

The U.S.-based Jewish Defence League (JDL), which got wind of the cartoon before it appeared and initiated an e-mail campaign to stop it, called the comic strip "highly crude, insulting and an example of outright Jew-hatred." A copy of the strip can be seen at the JDL Web site, www.jdl.org.

The League for Human Rights of B'nai Brith Canada, in a letter to the Toronto Sun, which carried the strip, suggested the comics page is no place for the kind of theological debate raised by the cartoon.

"It's a theology that caused the deaths of thousands of Jews over the years. It is extremely damaging to all the work [of reconciliation] done between Christians and Jews," said Amelia Golden, community relations co-ordinator for B'nai Brith Canada.

Prutschi said Congress members across Canada contacted local newspapers in advance of the scheduled appearance of the strip to request they pull the comic or run accompanying articles to explain its context.

The Ottawa Citizen and the Calgary Herald apologized for the offence the cartoon created, while also running articles about the strip. The Edmonton Journal declined to carry the strip while the Winnipeg Free Press, Toronto Sun, Edmonton Sun, Globe and Mail, National Post and New Brunswick Telegraph-Journal ran stories on the issue.

The Los Angeles Times noted that Hart, 70, began injecting overtly Christian themes to his work in the early 1980s. In 1999, Hart told the Washington Post that "Jews and Muslims who don't accept Jesus will burn in hell." He also asserted that homosexuality is the handiwork of Satan and that the end of the world may come by the year 2010, the Times reported.

Hart responded to the critiques with an online statement (www.creators.com/comics/JHStatement.php4) in which he explained the theology behind the comic strip and added:

"I regret if some people misunderstood the strip and it hurt their feelings...This is a holy week for both Christians and Jews and my intent, as always was to pay tribute to both."

In a later addition to his statement, Hart rejected suggestions he subscribed to "replacement theology" in which Christianity superseded and took the place of Judaism. He called it "the stuff of lunatics and self deluded fools.

"I wanted everyone to see the cross in the Menorah," he stated. "It was a revelation to me, that tied God's chosen people to their spiritual next of kin – the disciples of the Risen Christ."

Hart criticized efforts to prevent papers from carrying the strip, calling it censorship and "an across the board classic violation" of constitutional right to free expression. The U.S. constitution prohibits governmental encroachments on fundamental rights, not individuals exercising judgment on the comic strips they will carry, the JDL responded.

Hart said he chose to incorporate the menorah in his strip because its seven branches had mystical connections to other biblical "sevens," including "seven utterances from the cross."

White nationalist group faced with road block

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — The Canadian Heritage Alliance (CHA) has been met with a roadblock in its bid to sponsor a stretch of road in the regional municipality of Waterloo.

Last week, the municipality's commission of engineering terminated the CHA's participation in the region's Adopt A Road program and took down the group's sign on a two-kilometre section of the Dickie Settlement Road.

"The sign and the involvement of this organization in the road clean-up program have been terminated on the basis that their participation could jeopardize community support for the program," stated a municipality news release.

The move came after the media reported the CHA had links to white supremacist organizations and promoted a white nationalist agenda.

The CHA Web site features numerous articles promoting white pride and denouncing immigration from Third World countries. Internet links to the CHA are found on Freedom Site, a Web address that promotes white supremacy.

Links from the CHA site offer ghoulish articles by William Pierce, author of the Turner Diaries, the book that inspired Ken McVeigh to bomb the federal building in Oklahoma City. A Pierce article posted on the CHA site alleges Russian Jews are behind a white slave trade.

CHA sponsors regional road

Ken Seiling, chair of the regional municipality of Waterloo, said "as soon as we saw who was involved, we knew it would be controversial...and might have harmed the program."

Most highway sponsors are service clubs, churches, schools and other volunteer community groups. Although there is no cost to sponsor a stretch of road, the groups pick up road side waste and bag it two or three times a year, he said.

Several other road sponsors have the word heritage in their names and "unless you're politically attuned to the CHA, you wouldn't know" there was anything amiss, Seiling said.

The CHA responded to the termination with a statement on its Web site, saying, it is "a further demonstration on how freedom of thought is considered intolerable in Canadian society. Instead of confronting us, they make their judgements and decisions based solely on their own biases."

CHA spokesperson Melissa Guile, 28, rejected suggestions the CHA was a hate group, calling it instead a nationalist organization, the Kitchener-Waterloo Record reported.

But Len Rudner, director of community relations for Canadian Jewish Congress' Ontario region, said "groups like the CHA espouse a philosophy that if openly proclaimed would repulse the vast majority of Canadians."

By sponsoring a stretch of road, the group hoped to get its name in front of the public in banal circumstances so that "increasingly, people would see it as just another organization. Waterloo region acted properly, promptly and firmly in denying the CHA even the smallest particle of validation," Rudner said.

Holocaust Awareness Week held in Winnipeg

By MYRON LOVE
Prairies Correspondent

WINNIPEG — This year's Holocaust Awareness Week mingled new programs with established ones.

The opening program, on April 16, called Israel and the Holocaust, was co-sponsored by the Jewish Federation of Winnipeg/CJA's community relations department and young adult division, the Israel Experience Centre of the Rady Jewish Community Centre and the Canada-Israel Committee (CIC). It was especially aimed at attracting Birthright Israel program participants.

Mara Messinger, the CIC's director of community development, explored the Holocaust, Israel and Jewish identity with the students.

That same evening, the United Jewish People's Order and its offshoot, the Sholem Aleichem group, told the story of Jewish women partisans.

On April 17, in a new program called The Music of Terezin, the Boreas String Quartet performed two concerts in tribute to two brilliant but little-known composers – Ervin Schulhoff and Gideon Klein – whose creativity was cut tragically short by the Holocaust.

Terezin, a concentration camp located in Czechoslovakia and also known as Theresienstadt, was the Nazis' "model" camp, the one they showed off to the Red Cross and other visitors to show "how well" they were treating Jewish and other prisoners.

Yet more than 30,000 prisoners died there, of starvation, sickness and torture. Among them were many of the most talented of Europe's artists, poets, writers and composers.

The members of the Boreas String Quartet are violinists David Visentin and Hiroko Kagawa, violist Elise Lavallee and cellist Yuri Hooker. All are also members of the Winnipeg Symphony Orchestra.

Visentin and Hooker began the program with the lively but unfinished Duo for Violin and Cello by Klein. Born in 1919, Klein was considered a piano prodigy. He was still finding his musical footing when he was murdered in his early 20s.

The quartet then played several compositions by Schulhoff, who has been described by the Globe and Mail as one of the greatest composers of the 20th century.

"His music has elements of jazz and ragtime as well as the folk melodies of his native Czechoslovakia," Visentin said.

Another new Holocaust program, this one for youth, was a showing on April 22 of the documentary film The Wave, co-sponsored by the federation's youth advisory council, the March of the Living and the Jewish Child & Family Service.

The Wave documents a California schoolteacher's experiment with authoritarianism, and explores the implications of group brainwashing. The film was intended to stimulate discussion among students as to whether an authoritarian ethos could develop in their own schools.

On April 18, McNally Robinson Booksellers, Winnipeg's largest independently owned bookstore and the Jewish Federation of Winnipeg/CJA hosted a public forum featuring three prominent local writers Allan Levine, Carol Matas and Barney Sneiderman who have written about the Holocaust. After the event, McNally Robinson sold related books; the store carried an enhanced selection of Holocaust-related books throughout the week.

Last Thursday, the Jewish Heritage Centre of Western Canada presented a film followed by a panel discussion about the Jewish refugee community in Shanghai during the war. The panel featured Jewish Winnipeggers whose families spent the war years in Shanghai. The program ties in with the centre's current exhibit.

On Yom Hashoah April 20, B'nai Brith Canada once again sponsored Unto Every Person There is a Name, where the names of victims who have families in Winnipeg are read out in the rotunda of the Legislative Building. That was followed by the annual public memorial service at the Holocaust Monument on the grounds of the Legislature.

The annual community Holocaust memorial service was held at the Bnay Abraham Synagogue on Sunday, April 22.

Musings during Parliament's break

Even though the House of Commons was silent last week, the voices of the men and women who normally occupy that chamber could be heard musing about this and that. What follows is a sampling of some of the more "interesting" musings.

It is fitting to lead off with the "comic-strip scandal," given that the Parliamentary break was occasioned by the Easter statutory holiday. As you know, a popular comic strip caused outrage in the Jewish community by depicting a process of conversion from a Jewish menorah to a Christian cross. Created by an accomplished evangelical Christian cartoonist, the strip was viewed as deeply offensive to many Jews – and it would appear to some Christians, too.

However, some of the Jewish community's best friends on the Hill can be found within the evangelical camp. When asked about the cartoon, a couple of them shrugged and suggested the Jews should lighten up – it was only meant to honour the spirit of Jesus at Easter time. Another clarified the deeper significance of the cartoon. "In a few panels," one MP explained, "the artist has traced the evolution of Christianity from its Jewish roots to the ascent of Jesus." Uh-huh! It serves as a reminder of how careful one must be... even with one's best friends.

Scene in Ottawa
By G.K. SIMCOE

Another issue receiving lots of attention is the Quebec Summit of the Americas. Unfortunately, little media attention has been paid to the real concerns that ostensibly brought these masses out. But I digress.

One good friend mused aloud about the extensive and elaborate security measures that have been put into place: manholes and sewers welded shut, three metre fences, a fleet of attack helicopters and a multi-force, multi-national, multi-specialized militia to protect fewer men than fit on the Blue Jays roster. "If it takes that many people that many resources to secure a tiny area that is already hermetically sealed," asked the friend, "why would the government comment on Israel's measures to reduce the security threat it faces along a huge and porous border with hostile enemies all around?" Good question. Perhaps when the community meets next with John Manley, Colin Powell's new best friend, they could seek an answer from him.

Finally, there has been some jockeying for position as backbenchers and opposition MPs angle for a spot on the annual Canada-Israel Committee trip to Israel. Considered the most legitimate and one of the most fun junkets around, the aforementioned John Manley was once heard to say to a colleague that it was a surefire way to jump the queue into Cabinet. Given the current situation in the Middle East, the trip may be a lot more exciting than usual...

Five anti-Israel resolutions voted on at the UN

On April 6, Canada abstained on a resolution reaffirming the "inalienable, permanent and unqualified right" of Palestinians to self-determination, including their right to establish a sovereign and independent state. The resolution passed by a vote of 48 for, two against (the United States and Guatemala) and two abstentions (Romania and Canada).

Canada explained its vote by saying that while it supports the Palestinian people's right to self-determination, the issue must be settled "in the context of direct, bilateral negotiations." Canada added that its abstention is "consistent" with its previous neutral votes on the issue.

Israel is an observer at the UNCHR and cannot vote. But its UN ambassador, Yaakov Levy, rejected the vote, saying Palestinian self-determination is a political issue that can be resolved only through negotiations.

On April 18, Canada supported a motion that expressed "grave concern at continuing Israeli settlement activities, including the expansion of settlements, the installation of settlers in the occupied territories, the expropriation of land, the demolition of houses, the confiscation of property, the expulsion of Palestinians and the construction of bypass roads." The resolution also expressed "grave concern at and strongly condemned all acts of terrorism and violence."

The measure passed by a vote of 50 in favour, one against (the United States) and one abstention (Costa Rica).

'Israel is an observer at the UNCHR and cannot vote'

Given Ottawa's long-standing view that post-1967 lands are occupied and that settlement activities are unhelpful to the peace process, "we didn't expect Canada to vote any other way," said Robert Ritter, the CIC's national executive director.

Canada abstained on three other resolutions that condemned Israel for alleged human rights violations. The most contentious of them expressed "grave concern at the deterioration of the human rights and humanitarian situation in the occupied Palestinian territories, condemned the disproportionate and indiscriminate recourse to force, which could not but aggravate the situation and increase an already high death toll, and urged the government of Israel to make every effort to ensure that its security forces observed international standards regarding the use of force."

The resolution passed by a vote of 28 for, two against and 22 abstentions. Israel strongly rejected the measure as one-sided.

Canada also abstained on votes denouncing Israel for "imposing" its laws on the "occupied Syrian Golan," and another calling Israel to task for purportedly violating the human rights of Lebanese detainees. Both measures passed easily.

But a positive development was seen in Canada's vote against a resolution on combatting "defamation of religions as a means to promote human rights, social harmony and religious and cultural diversity." The measure called on member states to provide "adequate protection against all human rights violations resulting from defamation of religions."

Canada explained its opposition to the motion by saying the "divisive" issue did not advance the protection of human rights, but rather confused things by mixing racism with religious intolerance. The resolution also did not adequately address questions of the links between diversity and the fight against racism, Canada said.

Neverthless, the motion passed by a vote of 28 for, 15 against and nine abstentions.

The CIC's Ritter praised Canada's stand, saying it provides a glimpse into this country's opposition to re-introducing the old Zionism-is-racism canard at the UN-backed World Conference Against Racism, Racial Discrimination, Xenophobia and Related Intolerance slated for Durban, South Africa this summer.

Canada "is working diligently" to ensure the issue will not be raised in Durban, Ritter stated.

Overall, the CIC "is not unhappy" with Canada's votes at the UNCHR. "They're fairly consistent with previous years" and represent "no erosion" in Canada's relations with Israel.

The ongoing challenge for Canada, especially in the wake of its support for last autumn's resolution that condemned Israel for excessive force against Palestinians, is "to understand the extent to which what's going at the UN is being used for political purposes," Ritter said. Canada should be "more sensitive to that abuse."

Hillel students celebrate Pesach in Kishinev

By MIRIAM SHAPOSHNIK
Special to The CJN

Kadesh, Urchatz, Karpas, Yachatz, Magid, Rachtsa, Motze Matzah...

The week started and ended in song.

On April 3, Karen Held, Ora Zobin, Liz Lasky, Janice Elster and I flew halfway around the world to Kishinev, Moldova. Most of us had never heard of such a place, let alone known what to expect of it.

Nevertheless, we were on our way to participate in the Pesach Project.

We were all somewhat hesitant about going to the former Soviet Union (FSU), especially after having heard that Communism had just been voted back into power in Moldova. We were also excited at having been picked to participate in the mitzvah of bringing back Pesach to the FSU.

We expected to find a run-down community with few Jews remaining. Instead, we were greeted by a community on the rise, one that is very much alive and well. What a pleasant surprise for us!

We were a little concerned about whether we would get along with our Moldovan counterparts. We did not know if they would speak English. After anticipating the worst, we were truly touched by our first activity with them. For most of that evening, we sang together. It was such an overwhelmingly incredible feeling to know that even though we were from the other side of the world, we all knew the same songs. More than anything else, our songs broke the ice and showed us that we were not so different after all. They made us feel that we are one people, one community.

One of our first days there, we went on a tour of old Jewish Kishinev. Perhaps for others who have participated in trips such as March of the Living, this experience was not that significant, though somehow I doubt it. For me, it was this tour that linked my feelings most strongly to Kishinev. It's one thing to read about the ghettos and the pogroms that took place there, it's one thing to know vaguely about the communist oppression from our textbooks at home, but to actually see it, to actually be in the place where it happened, is entirely different. It made us appreciate how lucky we are to be free to practise our Judaism, and it made us admire Kishinev's present Jewish community so much more now that we understood how much they had to overcome to get to this point.

For me, the tour had special significance because my family is from Kishinev and the tour touched a soft spot in my heart. I knew the troubles my family had faced, and despite all the stories I had heard from my grandmother, this was the first time I really felt their pain, my pain.

After that, my admiration for the Jewish community in Kishinev grew to pride. It felt as if they were a representation of my own family, standing up after such a long time of being pushed down.

From the start of our trip, we couldn't help noticing that there was something very special about the Jewish community in Kishinev. They embrace their Judaism so tightly, they celebrate it with such enthusiasm.

Every Friday night, the Hillel students hold Shabbat services. At the one we attended, the enthusiasm was indescribable. Everyone sang loudly, everyone danced. It was evident that everyone was genuinely proud to be a Jew. Sadly, I have yet to see that kind of enthusiasm at a student-run program here.

This trip changed how we look at the world, changed the way we view Jewish people everywhere. Our memories will stay in our hearts forever. One song that we taught to our Moldovan counterparts was Echad Mi Yodea. None of us will ever forget our rendition of this song during the second seder, complete with actions.

We were continually amazed, day after day, by the community's hard work and incredible accomplishments. There was nothing for us to teach them. They were the heart of the Pesach Project.

We had a plagues bag that we wanted to use during the seder, but we didn't end up using them because the Moldovans felt that toys would take away from the seriousness of the seder. This really showed us how much we take our religious freedom for granted. We have each had about 20 years of seders, whereas the Kishinev Hillel students have each had about two. The seders we held at Hillel were "really super," as the Kishinovtse say.

Echad, mi yodea. Echad ani yodea – one is for our Jewish nation, it is strong and alive in many areas. Am Yisrael chai!

Miriam Shaposhnik is a student at York University. The Pesach Project that sent her to Kishinev is operated in Toronto by Jewish Campus Services of Greater Toronto and funded by the continuity committee of the UJA FEDERATION of Greater Toronto.

Childhood friends mark 75 years of marriage

By CYNTHIA GASNER
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — Mary and Maurice Weisdorf will celebrate their 75th wedding anniversary on May 2.

They are first cousins who were childhood friends. Both are 97.

Engagement photo

"We just grew together. We've had a happy life and we would do it again," Mary Weisdorf says.

Now residents of Forest Hill Place, an independent lifestyles retirement community, the Weisdorfs will be joined at a reception celebrating their anniversary by their two daughters, Ruth Foster Shaul and Fern Horowitz, and residents, friends and family members.

Both were born in Poland, Mary in Wierbznik and Maurice in Wasniow. Mary arrived in Canada in 1920, Maurice the following year. They married at the Hebrew Men of England Synagogue in 1926 and honeymooned in a rented flat in Kew Beach.

Maurice's first job was at Acme Cloak on Duncan Street, where he was paid $5 a week. But he loved music and also took voice training.

The young couple opened Weston Ladies Shoppe, later Weisdorf's Ladies Wear in Weston, then a small Victorian town. Mary worked in the shop while she cared for her one-year-old daughter in their flat above the store.

Maurice commuted to his work in Toronto and he would bring back kosher food, often travelling the 12 miles on several street cars. Mary recalls those early years. She says they worked hard but had a wonderful family life. Every Sunday, the family would travel to Toronto to be with their extended family.

Above: Mary and Maurice Weisdorf two years ago and (below) at their wedding.

The first and only Jewish family living in Weston, Ruth and Fern recall the great respect the family was accorded in the community.

Known to his friends and family as Moishelle Chazzan, Maurice, who has a fine tenor voice, sang at many synagogues and was once the guest performer at the Weston United Church, where he sang Hebrew and Yiddish folk songs.

A voracious reader of philosophy, politics and science, Maurice served as president of the Weston Businessmen's Association and was an active member of the Rotary Club, where he was a featured speaker.

The family moved into Toronto in 1944, but their daughters, who helped in the store, commuted to Weston to complete their education. They closed the store in 1960. Maurice dabbled in real estate and the Weisbrods embarked on a life of golf, swimming and a great deal of travel.

They were adventurous. They took a three-month trip around the world on a Chinese cargo ship, travelled through the Scandinavian countries and visited South America. In Rome, they met Pope Pius XII at the Vatican in the late 1950s.

Their daughters told The CJN that "God never created more loving and devoted parents. There was always open affection between them. We were and are lucky to have such wonderful parents."

The Weisdorfs have eight grandchildren and 11 great-grandchildren. "My parents have had a tremendous influence on our children. Morally and ethically, they discuss all kinds of philosophical topics with us and their grandchildren," Fern says.

In an interview at Forest Hill Place, Mary said their marriage was a success, because "we never dwelled on negativity."

Suicide bomber kills one, wounds 61 in Kfar Saba

Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

KFAR SABA, Israel — The police posted hundreds of additional officers in the Sharon area in preparation for Independence Day, after the third bombing attempt in a week in the area killed one person and wounded 61 on Sunday.

Dr. Mario Goldin, 53, a Kfar Saba resident who worked with terror victims at the Beit Levinstein rehabilitation hospital, fell victim himself to terror when a still unidentified man wearing a large bomb blew himself up at a bus stop at the main Kfar Saba intersection of Weizmann and Tchernichovsky streets, a few hundred metres from Meir Hospital.

Almost all the 61 wounded were released after treatment, although a 14-year-old boy remained in stable but critical condition Sunday night at Meir Hospital, and a pregnant woman who was lightly wounded remained at Beilinson Hospital overnight for observation.

The morning bombing came only hours after a security co-ordination session between top security officials from Israel and Gaza at the Erez junction on Saturday night.

The Prime Minister's Office released a statement blaming the Palestinian Authority for not doing more to halt the violence, and another security co-ordination session with West Bank Palestinian security officials was scheduled Sunday night. Israel also postponed planned abatements of the tight economic siege on the territories.

Police Chief Shlomo Aharonishki said at the scene of the bombing, which snarled traffic for hours in the suburban town north of Tel Aviv, that "quite a few bombings have been prevented, but it's impossible to hermetically seal Israel off from the territories, especially in the Sharon area." He called this "the soft belly" of the country because of the proximity of Israeli and Palestinian settlements.

"There's a limit to what the police can do, even when at full alert," he said.

But he added that hundreds of police would be sent to the Sharon area prior to Independence Day celebrations. No changes were expected in Kfar Saba's own plans for the holiday, he said.

The army meanwhile sent its own troops into the "seam" – the area between Kalkiliya and Kfar Saba – to try to prevent the stream of Palestinians illegally crossing the border. While most are workers seeking jobs, some are clearly coming into Israel with other interests in mind.

The Shin Bet is looking into connections that may exist between the two previous terror incidents in Kfar Saba in the last week, as well as several other incidents in the area that indicate a single organization may be responsible for all the attacks.

Despite the bombing, security service officials say they have noted a marked drop in the number of violent incidents in the territories since the security co-ordination session Saturday night.

Defence Minister Benjamin Ben-Eliezer told a Channel 2 TV audience Sunday that "the fact no mortars were fired in the last 24 hours in Gaza is a direct result of instructions by the Palestinian Authority Chairman Yasser Arafat, just as he was the one who ordered the shooting."

Israel seeks 'improved' Egypt-Jordan peace plan

By ALUF BENN
Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — Israel is now leaning toward accepting an Egyptian-Jordanian proposal for ending the intifadah and resuming the peace process, according to Prime Minister Ariel Sharon and Foreign Minister Shimon Peres.

In a meeting of the security cabinet Sunday, Sharon said, "The Jordanian-Egyptian proposal is important, but the content is not good enough and it needs to be changed somewhat. We'll study the initiative, and we'll see what we can do to change it."

Later, Sharon reiterated the same thing to Belgian Foreign Minister Louis Michel, who asked him about the proposal.

Peres also told his Belgian counterpart: "We are ready to discuss the Jordanian-Egyptian proposal. It's important that there is an attempt and an effort to move things forward. The initiative can serve as a basis, but the details need to be worked on."

The proposal, initiated by Amman and Cairo, was formally presented to Sharon and Peres last week. It creates a framework for mutual steps to be taken by Israel and the Palestinian Authority (PA) to reach a ceasefire, rebuild confidence and resume the dialogue between them.

According to the initiative, Israel would lift the closures in the territories and withdraw to positions it held on the eve of the Al-Aksa intifadah, as well as freeze new settlement activity. The Palestinians would guarantee a renewal of security co-operation, and end incitement to violence. After a period of calm in the territories, the negotiations for a final agreement will resume, and an effort will be made to complete them within a year.

The European Union last week announced its support for the plan, and this weekend, EU foreign policy chief Javier Solana is due in Jerusalem, as part of his effort to prepare a report on ways the EU can step up its involvement in the Middle East.

Solana met Sunday with former minister Yossi Beilin, who suggested he try to organize a meeting between Sharon and PA Chairman Yasser Arafat.

'The road to peace is not an easy one'

Moshe Katsav

Fifty-three years is a short period in the Jewish people's ancient history. However, much has been achieved in Israel since its establishment after 2000 years of exile and 4000 years since becoming a nation.

Our country's population has grown to more than six million, including more than one million Arab citizens, who enjoy equal rights.

Immigrants have been absorbed from the four corners of the world including, in the last decade, one million Jews from the former Soviet Union and Ethiopia. Israel has provided all of them with social security, health insurance, a home, and has seen to their basic needs. There is no other country in the world which has succeeded, in one decade, in adding 20 percent to its population.

Israel today is a strong, democratic, free and modern country, one of the leaders in the world in the fields of advanced technology, hi-tech, medicine, medical equipment and agriculture.

The road to peace is not an easy one. It is full of obstacles, but we are determined to continue along this road for the benefit of our people and those of the region.

I wish to call on you to visit Israel more frequently and to encourage your youth to join us and gain an impression of our wonderful and developed country.

On the occasion of Independence Day, let us all unite around our common principles and let us work together to strengthen the Jewish people wherever they are.

Hezbollah leaders plot strategy in Tehran

By DANIEL SOBELMAN
Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — A delegation of Hezbollah leaders, led by Sheikh Hassan Nasrallah, has been meeting with the Iranian leadership in Tehran, in an effort to consolidate strategies following the recent escalation of violence on the Lebanon border and the Israeli attack against a Syrian radar post in Lebanon.

Meeting with the Hezbollah delegation, Iran's supreme leader Ayatollah Ali Khamenei called for renewed attacks against Israel, Iranian state television reported. The Palestinian intifadah, Khamenei said, was inspired by Hezbollah's struggle against Israel's occupation of Southern Lebanon.

Hezbollah should strengthen co-operation with other Lebanese groups "to stand against the plots of the Zionist regime," Khamenei added, according to the report.

Meanwhile, Hezbollah offensives against Israel continue to stir controversy in Lebanon. Reiterating criticism he expressed after the Hezbollah attacked an IDF tank crew at Har Dov, Lebanon's Prime Minister Rafik Hariri said Friday that the Palestinian intifadah, rather than Lebanon border disputes, should be the focus of activity.

"All attention should be directed [toward the] Palestinian intifadah against Israeli aggression," he said.

Black's British backlash

According to Reports

Last month in Britain's The Spectator magazine, Conrad Black created a major stir when he charged much of the English media of being anti-Israel in a particularly malignant way.

Black, the owner and publisher of The Spectator, denounced Taki Theodoracopulos, the magazine's social writer, for expressing an "irrational" hatred for Israel and for promoting "a blood libel on the Jewish people wherever they may be."

But Black did not confine his criticism to Taki, as he is called. Black further asserted that Taki's opinions "are not greatly more extreme than those of large sections of the British media which habitually apply a double standard when judging Israelis and Palestinians." He singled out most of the BBC, as well as The Independent, The Guardian, and Evening Standard newspapers, also noting that "the Foreign and Commonwealth Office are rabidly anti-Israel."

Black charged them with "wittingly or not, stoking the inferno of anti-Semitism."

Black's attack recalls a famous essay by America journalist Charles Krauthammer in Time magazine during the early days of the intifadah (1987-93). Along the same lines, he attributed the media's double standard to anti-Semitism.

Now, just as Krauthammer encountered a media backlash, so has Black. Nothing infuriates journalists who comment critically on Israel more than being accused of anti-Semitism. It has not been surprising, therefore, to find a slew of rebukes flung at Black, words that continue to reverberate.

Alan Rusbridger, editor of The Guardian, writing in the Jewish Chronicle under the headline "Newspaper's job is to tell truth as honestly seen," rejected Black's "tirades." While admitting that occasionally The Guardian gets "things wrong," Rusbridger categorically dismissed the charge of an "institutional bias" against Israel. He went on to praise his paper's reporters by name as "straight journalists" (though to call a veteran writer like David Hirst, who has never had a decent word to say about Israel, a "straight" journalist, is patently absurd.)

The Guardian's Middle East editor, Brian Whitaker, also praised by Rusbridger in the Jewish Chronicle, went one big step beyond his boss. In an article in The Guardian itself, called "Israel wins war of words," Whitaker undertook a content analysis of key phrases describing Israel-Palestinian relations and concluded that the British media, including BBC and his own newspaper, actually favoured Israel! Is Whitaker serious, or is this a peculiar form of British humour?

March of the Living spurs Jewish pride

BY ELI RUBENSTEIN
Special To The CJN

KRAKOW — "We are here. You did not succeed." That is how Holocaust refugee Inge Spitz described her emotions after taking part in the 2001 March of the Living.

Together with thousands of students from around the world, including a delegation of 250 Canadian students and chaperones, Inge participated in the symbolic 3.5-kilometre march from Auschwitz to Birkenau, which is held every year on Yom Hashoah.

Inge was just a child when she answered the door on Kristallnacht in November 1938, and watched the Nazis drag her father away. Inge, her sister Edith and 130 other children were sent to a children's home in France sponsored by the Rothschild family and later found refuge in Canada.

For many of the participants, The March was a major catalyst for Jewish pride.

"I was at the front of The March, carrying the Israel flag. At one point, when we reached the top of the hill, I looked back and saw a sea of blue jackets following me," said Ilanna Besner of Montreal. "I've never felt more pride in being Jewish than at that moment."

Janice Bacher, a student from Toronto, agreed. 'The sea of blue jackets filled us with instant pride," she said. "I felt even prouder when we finished the ceremony in Birkenau after The March, when all of us sang Hatikvah. It was the common language that unified us."

For Toronto's Nathan Leipciger, a survivor of one of the death marches, The March was bittersweet.

"It was bitter because of my own memories of the death march with my father. It was sweet because I was with thousands of young people – articulate, intelligent and committed – who are our future leaders."

For Montreal survivor Rena Schondorf, seeing Birkenau again was painful.

"It was a very difficult feeling because I remember when we first arrived in Birkenau in October of 1944. But this time we entered as proud Jews, not as beaten Jews chased by the Nazi guards and their dogs," she said.

Many of the students reflected on the six million who perished.

"As I saw the thousands of people marching, I thought about how big a number six million Jews must be, how just as these thousands of people have different stories and different dreams, so did each of the six million," Rachel Bernstein, a student from Toronto noted. "And then I thought about how surprised and proud they would be... if they were to see this March."

Learning about the harsh conditions at the camp made some students realize how fortunate they are.

"I felt as if we had taken so much for granted," Ilanna Besner said. "During The March, it was raining and it was cold. And then I thought of all the people in Auschwitz, how they had almost no food, how they had no proper clothing even in the dead of winter, and what they must have went through."

Omie El Sharif of Montreal agreed. "We marched in the spring, for only three kilometres. They marched in the freezing cold winter, 300 kilometres or more."

"The rain that soaked my body will dry, but the tears that drenched my soul will remain forever," wrote Yossi Izraelski of Toronto, after The March.

"We marched for all those who, at some point, could march no longer," said Ryan Banach, a student from Toronto.

The adult chaperones were impressed with the students' reaction to the trip.

"It is a dramatic reaffirmation of our faith in the Jewish future to see young people so committed to their faith, their tradition and their history, to see them proudly proclaim Am Yisrael chai," Montreal chaperone Rabbi Reuben Poupko said.

Liselotte Ivri of Montreal, a survivor of Terezin, Auschwitz, Birkenau and other camps, was also full of admiration for the students:

"I am proud to be with these young people on The March. This is my reason for going: To teach, to inform them, and to be there for them," she said. "But they are also there for me. They are my strength. They are my future."

After The March, the participants continued their journey in Poland, including visits to other former Nazi death camps and to small towns and villages that were once filled with Jewish life and culture.

One of the towns the next Montreal delegation will visit is Jedwabne, which was recently revealed to have been the site of a large massacre of Jewish residents by the local Polish population during the Holocaust. (The Polish government has since apologized and plans to hold a commemorative ceremony at the site this summer.)

After their emotional week in Poland, the delegation will travel to Israel for one week, where they will tour and take part in festivities celebrating Israel's 53rd anniversary.

Eli Rubenstein is national director of The March of the Living.

"FULL-FIGURED" women's fashions

From the moment Robin was told by fashion experts that stylish clothing and full-figured garments couldn't unite, she knew that she alone would carry the mantle.

Robin wanted women of PLUS SIZES to have a generous choice of fashionable garments. This would allow full-figured women to be proud of their wardrobe and feel they were "in" fashion, rather than "out."

Robin created a paradise for plus size women. Robin's Plus Paradise is where she exclusively sells U.S.A. full-figure fashions ranging from sizes 14-44 and supersizes 1X-6X. The selection consists of denim, sweaters, dresses, pant sets, skirt sets, business suits and eveningwear.

The concept became a popular "must see" hothouse and within 2½ years, the location became so overstocked she moved to the current 2300 sq. ft. store.

Here you can still receive the best in personal service and helpful advice while experiencing the latest in-style garments. And if you come at the right time you just might get a chance to view Robin's latest addition — her beautiful baby!

CIBC makes difference in community

As Community Manager for East Toronto, Dave D'Amico has a twofold responsibility: one, to ensure a high quality of service within his member branches; and two, to promote goodwill and improve the quality of life in the surrounding community.

Dave D'Amico
East Toronto Community Manager
416-421-0051

Not unique to East Toronto, this approach is part of a company-wide commitment to providing help where help is needed. Underscoring this fact, in 2000 the CIBC donated some $35 million to a wide variety of charities and causes, including the Baycrest Centre, Mount Sinai Hospital, Community Centre 55, Toronto East General Hospital, several schools, and countless community projects.

D'Amico favours a hands-on approach that sees him personally participating in fund-raising and other charitable events. He also takes pleasure in encouraging employees, associates and friends to do likewise.

D'Amico brings to the table an extensive background in both banking and volunteer work. And as someone who has lived and worked in the East Toronto area for a number of years, he is well-positioned to turn CIBC's strong presence in the area (19 branches) to good account.

Building goodwill starts within each branch, he says. "We want every single visit to be a happy one for our customers. This is a standard we strive to uphold each and every day." Good works outside the branch are a natural extension of this philosophy, he says. "We want people to think of the CIBC not only as a great place to bank, but as a good neighbour."

D'Amico's approachability, easygoing manner and work ethic have endeared him to East Toronto business people and members of the general community, and he relishes the opportunity to serve. The sense that he is helping to make a difference gives him "all the gratification I need. Giving back to the community isn't something that's nice to do, it's something we have to do."

D'Amico can be reached directly at 416-421-0051.

Art exhibit to support Ashkenaz Festival

By CYNTHIA GASNER
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — Artists, sponsors, patrons, Ashkenaz volunteers and Brian Liss of the Liss Gallery have combined their talents and efforts to present Illuminations: Visions of the Poets and Sages, a visual feast of Yiddish/Jewish themes.

This free exhibit will be held at the Liss Gallery, 978 Eglinton Ave. W., from May 4 to 13.

Canadian visual artist Ian Leventhal is the curator of Illuminations. His works, along with 50 paintings by other artists, will be exhibited and for sale. The art reflects the personal and spiritual odysseys of the artists, through Jewish literary masterpieces.

Illuminations features the works of Dubie Arie, Laya Crust, Gina Godfrey, Heather Kroll Levine, Lisa Rotenberg, Judy Singer and Pedie Wolfond.

Leventhal said the enthusiasm generated by the Ashkenaz Festival of New Yiddish Culture in recent years has caused an explosion of Jewish art, music and writing in our community.

"When I approached local artists to participate in creating the Illuminations show, the responses were overwhelmingly positive," he said.

"The opportunity to add another thread to the vibrant tapestry of Jewish life proved too tantalizing for any artist to turn down."

Each artist, said Helen Daniels, president of the Ashkenaz Foundation, has drawn upon the 4,000-year-old history of Jewish writings for inspiration – the Five Books of Moses, the Psalms, the Prophets and Yiddish poetry.

"It is a visual interpretation of a cornucopia of Jewish thought, from the sacred to the purely comical," she said.

Proceeds of the exhibition will be used to support the next Ashkenaz Festival, which will be held in August 2002, Daniels announced recently.

In addition to producing the community-wide Ashkenaz festivals, the foundation presents selected cultural events throughout the year – like Illuminations – in co-operation with UJA FEDERATION as part of the Jewish Toronto Tomorrow initiative, and with the Bloor Jewish Community Centre.

Daniels, who recently visited eastern Europe, said she was "deeply moved to see the remains of what once was such a culturally rich and vibrant society struggle to survive. The few Jews left are either unaffiliated, intermarried, assimilated or indifferent."

Comparing the European experience with that of North American Jews, she said she couldn't help but relate this to the endeavours of Ashkenaz.

"To keep the memories of Yiddish culture alive and to encourage the continuation of future Jewish artistic talent reinforces my commitment to keep the dream, hopes and aspirations of the Ashkenaz Foundation alive – the place where Yiddish culture continues to thrive," she said.

The first three Ashkenaz festivals have been overwhelmingly successful. "They grew faster than the foundation could support such a massive effort. We needed time to reorganize," Daniels said.

"We have thoroughly reviewed our goals and financial needs, and reassessed the community's needs. With the help of the community, we are building a new foundation for operating one of the world's finest Jewish cultural events."

David Bookbinder, Ashkenaz founder and artistic director, has initiated plans for Ashkenaz Festival 2002, and talent is already being reviewed, Daniels said.

Ron Hoffman, who with his wife Heather is co-chair of Illuminations, said, "Culture is a critical element in the way many of us identify Jewishly."

These Angels don't like foot cake

Ottawa resident Sharon Katz wrote, directed and animated The Angel's Foot Cake, a six-minute short about the spirited struggle to bake a cake in the shape of an angel's foot, in spite of the offended and interfering response of the Angels.

"I originally wrote this humorous story almost 20 years ago for my husband who loves good food, especially cake and whose first language is Yiddish," Katz says.

"When I decided to animate it, the first question that came to mind was the language that the characters would speak.

"While I heard Yiddish spoken in my home as a child, I was encouraged to speak English. Mirroring the experience of my childhood, I decided that the central character would speak in English and the characters of authority, the Angels, would speak in Yiddish," she said.

Angel's Foot Cake gets its world premiere at the Toronto Jewish Film Festival, April 29, at noon, with the feature film Love and Sacrifice.

WORKS OF ARTIST TUTZI SEGUIN ON VIEW AT BATHURST CENTRE

Tutzi Seguin, an 89-year-old artist who came to Canada from Romania in 1938, is no stranger to tragedy, having lost her three children and, more recently, her husband of 65 years. Seguin says her work has been a tremendous therapy for her over the years.

"I'm told that I can inspire other people to continue with their lives in spite of handicaps," she says. "Spirituality and creativity have made it possible for me to accept whatever happens."

Her exhibition, Nostalgia: Images of Romanian Gypsies by the Black Sea, consists of some 50 small-scale oils on canvas. It is on display May 6 to 31 in the atrium of the Bathurst Jewish Community Centre, at the Koffler Complex, 4588 Bathurst St.

Folk Choir pays tribute to Milton Barnes

By CYNTHIA GASNER
Special to The CJN

TORONTO—The 75th annual spring concert of The Toronto Jewish Folk Choir will honour the memory of the renowned Canadian composer, Milton Barnes with the performance of one of his last works.

Barnes, who had a close and productive association with the choir, died Feb. 26. The choir will perform his klezmer-style dance suite, Dos Naye Lid (The New Song). Esther Ghan Firestone conducts with Lina Zemelman as pianist.

Featured at the concert is Vladimir Heifetz's setting of the short story, Oyfn Fidl (The Fiddle) by beloved Yiddish writer Sholem Aleichem, who died 85 years ago.

Guest soloist in this folk cantata is bass-baritone Marat Maxutov, a recent immigrant from Kazakhstan. Maxutov holds the title Honoured Artist from that Republic. He has frequently appeared on radio and TV and has delighted the Choir's audiences since the 1997 spring concert.

Nine-year-old violin prodigy, Rebecca Brenner, will also appear in this work. Oyfn Fidl is the story of a young boy's enchantment with the music of the violin and the troubles he caused himself and his family because of his infatuation.

Brenner was featured guest violin soloist with the Toronto Symphony Orchestra for its student concert series in 1998 and last year she performed with the Symphony in its outdoor concert series on Centre Island. She will appear with the TSO in February 2002 with the Pops Series.

Rebecca Brenner

She also appeared with the National Academy Orchestra to celebrate both the Brott Summer and Autumn Music Festivals in Hamilton.

Veteran actor and director Sydney Perlmutter will narrate in Yiddish and English. A former Winnipeg teacher, actor and director, Perlmutter has performed many roles for stage, radio and television and directed more than 10 major shows. Over several decades, he has conducted many courses at Ryerson Polytechnic University for educators and broadcasters. Last year saw his first collaboration with the Toronto Jewish Folk Choir as stage manager.

The concert will include popular spiritual songs in Hebrew and English and works by two other late Toronto composers, Leon Zuckert's Oyfn Veg (On the Road), and Louis Applebaum's A Vision of Peace.

Founded in 1925 by immigrant needle-trade workers on D'Arcy St. in downtown Toronto, The Toronto Jewish Folk Choir has built a reputation for commissioning and performing masterworks of Yiddish music, as well as music on Jewish themes in Hebrew, Judeo-Spanish and English, and songs from other cultures.

The choir has performed works by Handel, Mendelssohn, Schubert and presented such guest performers as Lois Marshall, Jan Peerce, and Jennie Tourel. The concert takes place Sunday April 29 at 3 p.m. at Temple Sinai, 210 Wilson Ave. Tickets are $18, $15 for seniors and students and are available at many Judaica stores. Arthur Miller's The Price on at Holy Blossom

By KATHRYN KATES
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — Holy Blossom Temple Stagecraft Company will present the powerful drama The Price by Arthur Miller at the Eisendrath Auditorium, Holy Blossom Temple, 1950 Bathurst St.

"The Price was first produced in 1968, it depicts the struggle between two brothers who are haunted and divided by their memories of the past," says Michael Ryval, the play's director.

"After a 16-year estrangement, they meet in the attic of their late parents' home to dispose of their furniture, but instead re-live the jealousies and pain of life under a tyrannical father," he says.

Ryval, a freelance business writer, directed last year's production of In the Cemetery, a one-act play that was part of the trilogy, From Darkness to Light.

"I've always been an admirer of Arthur Miller's plays, but was especially impressed with a revival of The Price that my wife and I saw last year in New York. The Price has a timeless quality to it. Its depiction of two brothers struggling with the burdens of the past, is a profoundly moving one.

"And even though it is one of the most demanding plays we have done, I am confident that we will carry it off and deliver as memorable a performance as any professional company," he says.

The Price features Eric Kirsh, Karen Garmaise, Ron Boyd and Murray Ellis.

Stagecraft was founded in 1995 by members of Holy Blossom Temple and is devoted to presenting plays with Jewish themes and content.

The Price is Stagecraft's 12th production. Past theatricals produced by Stagecraft include Counsellor-at-Law, The Tenth Man, Yentl, Broken Glass and Crossing Delancey.

The play runs May 3, 5 and 6 at 7:30 p.m. Tickets are $10 in advance, $12 at the door. Seniors and students $6 for Thursday and Sunday performances only. For more information call, 416-789-3291, ext. 511.

The city of fountains on the Limmat

By JOSIE NEWMAN
Special to The CJN

ZURICH — Zurich is a city for architecture and history lovers, where Romanesque and Gothic buildings blend together esthetically along winding, cobblestone streets that converge at the Limmat River.

It's known as the "city of fountains" because of the 1,200 Greek and Romanesque style fountains built here during the 17th Century.

The Limmat wound through the centre of the old city during medieval times — the 12th and 13th centuries — when Zurich became a thriving power in the Old World. The city was founded between 10 and 20 BCE by the Romans, and Jews they brought along as advisers and doctors.

There are now 7,000 Jews living in Zurich and seven active synagogues. They figure prominently in the life of the city — the head of the Zurich Banking Association is Jewish — even though the majority of Zurich's population is Christian. In fact, Zurich has been described as a "Protestant, puritanical city".

Such peaceful harmony didn't always exist. Although the Jews contributed to much of Zurich's early wealth and success, by the mid-14th century Jews were being imprisoned and tortured by Christians. By the early 15th century, Jews' houses were being routinely burnt down. The final straw came when a well in the street next to the Jewish Quarter became filled with poisonous water, bringing plague and pestilence to the city.

Other residents blamed the Jews, claiming they had poisoned the fountain, and, in 1435, the Jews were expelled from Zurich. They lived in two villages outside Zurich until 1862, when a law of emancipation allowed them to move back into town.

After the Holocaust, it was once more the Jews who smoothed troubled waters. When surviving Jews worldwide converged in New York to receive Holocaust money for their deceased relatives, most of the Jews from Zurich didn't qualify because they weren't given death certificates from the Nazis.

Instead of insisting on getting the money, they asked for their communities and quality of life back.

Zurich is also an active cultural centre and the birthplace of Dadaism, a modern art movement. It is the city where Richard Wagner spent a decade of his life and wrote Tristan and Isolde, an opera based on his illicit affair with his landlord's wife.

In 1996, some of Wagner's music was suddenly discovered in the choir section of The Preacher's Church, a Lutheran church in downtown Zurich. The Zurich Orchestra is currently playing that music in concert.

George Buchner, a playwright, wrote three renowned masterpieces in Zurich — including Danton's Death — before he died at 24 of typhus. The first printer was designed by Gutenberg here in the 1500s. The famous stained-glass windows of Marc Chagall are housed in one of Zurich's Reformed churches, Church of our Lady.

World-class shopping and restaurants abound along the Bahnhofstrasse, another testimony that Zurich is a timeless city with something for everyone.

Film focuses on anarchist/free-love advocate Emma Goldman

By BILL GLADSTONE
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — Deported from the United States in 1919 after serving a two-year prison sentence for "conspiracy against the draft" during World War I, "Red" Emma Goldman spent two years in Russia, where she met Lenin and encountered a Bolshevik society that she recognized as being more politically oppressive than anything she had experienced in America.

After a few years in Europe, the legendary anarchist and feminist moved to Toronto in 1926 to be close to the nation from which she had been exiled. She lived in various residences on Spadina Avenue for several years, remaining always a committed activist and the centre of a lively circle of supporters.

Several years ago, Toronto filmmaker Coleman Romalis discovered that Goldman had been living in 1940 with friends in a house on Vaughan Road, around the corner from where he lives. It was in that house that she suffered the first of two strokes that would silence her forever.

The discovery was the impetus for him to make Emma Goldman: the Anarchist Guest, an engrossing 42-minute documentary.

This well-researched film spotlights Goldman's Toronto years with intriguing interviews with people who knew her. Invariably they describe her as a "strong little woman" with a "commanding" presence and an "imperious" (or "bossy') manner.

Goldman respected Toronto's civility but was continuously irked by our small-minded conservatism. She longed to return to the United States, but was admitted only once, for a 90-day lecture tour in 1934, on the condition that she avoid the subject of politics. Fortunately she was also a free-love advocate who could speak rousingly about birth control. (She would have done so more often in Canada but for fear of violating our modest "blasphemy" laws.)

Goldman evidently practised what she preached, for she had no children despite a string of lovers. The film describes her as being addicted to young men, and her frank autobiographical descriptions of her amorous exploits proved shocking to many. Her life's grand passion was Dr. Ben Reitman, a womanizing Chicago medic with whom she had a relationship for many years.

A scene from The Anarchist Guest.

Kudos to Romalis for making this overdue profile of a hot-blooded American political creature forced by circumstance, like a bird whose wings have been clipped, into our droll provincial precincts. Her exile from America ended only with her return in a casket: she was buried in Chicago.

Emma Goldman: The Anarchist Guest is being screened Monday, April 30, 3 p.m., with the short film The Internationale, and director Romalis in attendance.

In Simon Magus, a British-made feature film, Christian and Jew battle for the right to build a railway station in their village in 19th-century Silesia.

The grey-haired squire who controls the land is a liberal-minded poet: He'll sell to the Jewish protagonist at a generous price provided the latter, an honourable young Talmud chacham named Dovid, takes up the squire's poetry.

Dovid's adversary, however, will stop at nothing to acquire the land for the railway station. He even hires a secret agent to help him get his way. Such tzuris the Jews don't need. The fate of the community, which has already been reduced to 10 men and their families, hangs precariously in the balance.

And just who is this secret agent? He is Simon Magus, an impoverished Jewish lunatic who casts spells for profit, has a hotline to Lucifer, and tries desperately to convert to the Cross.

In building his story, screenwriter-director Ben Hopkins tapped into a rich vein of mid-19th-century literature, now mostly forgotten, which fancifully explores the dramatic possibilities of Jewish assimilation into Christian Europe. Although the cast is strong, the characters are archetypes and the story a peculiar allegory that is true to neither Jewish nor gentile perspective.

Still, Simon Magus delivers much imagery redolent of this intriguing period, which, artistically speaking, is considered the cusp between romanticism and realism.

Despite its various loose ends and unsatisfying subplots, Simon Magus is a noteworthy effort. It is comparable, perhaps, to The Governess for its ability to establish a mid-19th-century mood, and to The Golem for its potent use of Jewish and Christian iconography.

The adept cast includes Embeth Davidtz, Rutger Hauer, Ian Holm, Amanda Ryan, and Noah Taylor as Simon. Stuart Townsend delivers a memorable performance as the likeable Dovid. The film is being screened with the short film The Signature (La Firma) on April 28, 9:15 p.m.

The Komediant (Monday, April 30, 1 p.m.) offers a rare glimpse into the world of Yiddish theatre with its fascinating profile of the unique Burstein family. An acclaimed actor on the Yiddish stage, Pesach'ke Burstein had a specialty – he could whistle tunes like a bird.

He and his actress-wife Lilian Lux went to the young State of Israel but found it hard to make a living in a culture where Hebrew was energetically promoted and the mameloshen of the masses officially frowned upon. So they moved to – where else? – New York.

They raised their twins Michael and Susan in the traditions of their profession and the family became a popular theatrical troupe that performed all over the world.

This recent Israeli-made feature, which is mostly in English with some subtitled Yiddish and Hebrew, presents rare footage of the Yiddish stage in Poland, as well as historic views of the Hebrew Actors Union in New York and the Yiddish theatrical demi-monde that grew up around 2nd Avenue on the Lower East Side. A thoroughly enjoyable 82 minutes.

Laughter On the 23rd Floor (Monday, April 30, 5 p.m.) is Neil Simon's tribute to the first generation of television comedy writers, based on his experience writing for Sid Caesar.

Shot in Toronto last year under the direction of Richard Benjamin and starring the excellent Nathan Lane and a strong ensemble cast, Laughter is slick, quick and very funny. Its biggest flaw – predictably, for Simon – is that it tickles the funny-bone unrelentingly.

This free, ticketed screening is presented in collaboration with Showtime Networks Inc.

Japanese diplomat saved over 2,000 Jews in Lithuania

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

Chiune Sugihara is the only Japanese national ever honoured by Yad Vashem, the Holocaust memorial-cum museum in Jerusalem. In contravention of Japan's official policy, he issued more than 2,000 transit visas to Jews trapped in Lithuania. With these precious documents, they found asylum in Japan and, later, in China.

Robert Kirk's 102-minute documentary of this improbable rescue mission by a middle-level Japanese diplomat, Sugihara: Conspiracy of Kindness, proves yet again that one daring, courageous person can make a difference.

As this engaging film suggests, Sugihara had no hidden agenda and never profited from his philanthropy. Doing what he thought was right, he was ultimately punished for his good deed.

Born in 1900, Sugihara started his diplomatic career in Harbin, China. Posted to Helsinki in 1936, he was sent to Kaunas, Lithuania on the eve of World War II.

Chiune Sugihara

Cursed by geography, Lithuania was occupied by the Soviet Union in 1940 and by Germany in 1941. Sugihara, the consul-general, began issuing transit visas in August 1940, just as he was preparing for his next assignment in Germany, Japan's ally.

The stampede for these transit visas was touched off by a Jew desperate to escape from the noose tightening around Kaunas. Having obtained permission to settle in the Dutch Caribbean island of Curacao, he needed a Japanese transit visa for the first crucial leg of the journey across the Soviet Union to the Pacific Ocean port of Vladivostok.

Cognizant of Germany's persecution of Jews, Sugihara granted the man a transit visa. As word spread like wildfire, thousands of Jews milled in front of the Japanese consulate to request similar visas. Working against the foreign ministry's instructions, Sugihara issued a grand total of 2,141 transit visas. With these in hand, visa holders could travel to Kobe, Japan by boat. After Japan's 1941 attack on Pearl Harbour, the refugees left Kobe and were placed in a ghetto in Shanghai, where they survived the war. Not a single refugee ever made it to Curacao.

In the aftermath of the war, Sugihara was dismissed from the foreign ministry. He took a series of menial jobs before landing a position with a trading company in Moscow. Until his death in 1986, he spurned attempts by grateful Jewish survivors to honour him.

Sugihara unfolds through fascinating pre-war file footage of Japan and China and interviews with members of Sugihara's family, among others.

The film explains Sugihara's motives, the Soviet government's reasons for allowing the refugees to travel overland across Siberia to Vladivostok, and Japan's complex attitudes toward Jews.

It is an intriguing movie about a remarkable footnote in the Holocaust. (May 2, 3 p.m.)

Vulcan Junction, a bracing drama from Israel directed by Eran Riklis, takes place in the week prior to the outbreak of the 1973 Yom Kippur War. Based on a real story, it turns on a group of amateur rock and roll musicians who seek fame and fortune.

Vulcan Junction evokes a more innocent era in Israel

The boys in the band, Genetic Code, perform in a dingy nightclub in Haifa. The place, Vulcan Junction, is run by a hip American who understands but does not speak Hebrew.

By day, these shaggy guys earn a living doing what they can, whether as a fireman or a soccer player.

Vulcan Junction gets under way when they audition for two producers in the hope of winning a recording contract. It will be their ticket to stardom.

Although it is non-political, the film juxtaposes their quest with that of foreboding television footage of Golda Meir and Moshe Dayan claiming that Israel cannot relinquish land to the Arabs in exchange for peace.

In this respect, younger viewers may be surprised to learn that, in spite of their affiliation with the left-of-centre Labour party, Dayan and Meir were quite hawkish on the Arab-Israeli dispute.

Since the Yom Kippur War shattered assumptions as well as lives, Vulcan Junction is pervaded by a sense of impending doom. The emphasis, however, is on the musicians, their public yearnings and their private doubts and disputes.

Buttressed by a fine script, naturalistic performances and a throbbing musical score that includes hit songs from Jethro Tull and Deep Purple, the film evokes a simpler, perhaps more innocent era in Israel. (May 1, 7:30 p.m. Shown with the short film Cock Fight.)

Lisa, from French director Pierre Grimblat, moves between the present and the past, exposing family secrets and underscoring France's betrayal of its Jewish citizens during the Nazi occupation.

Sam, a filmmaker in his late 20s, is trying to find out what happened to Sylvain Marceau, a dashing young French actor who vanished in the 1940s. The trail leads him to Lisa Maurin (played in understated fashion by Jeanne Moreau), an elderly woman with whom Marceau had an affair before his sudden disappearance.

As she recalls their passionate romance, we learn about Marceau's true identity. Though Jewish by birth, he was raised as a Catholic. Once France is occupied by Germany, Marceau finds himself in jeopardy. The Jewish patients of a tuberculosis sanitarium where Lisa is convalescing are also in danger of being rounded up by the Nazis and their French collaborators.

As details of Marceau's disappearance emerge, Sam uncovers something entirely new about his own family background.

Lisa, in French with English subtitles, is structurally too fragmented to be compelling. But the plot is of considerable interest, and the actors acquit themselves with a measure of panache.

(This film closes the festival, May 3 at 8 p.m. Shown with the Oscar-nominated short One Day Crossing.)

Genetic Code seek their fame and fortune in Vulcan Junction, a nightclub in Haifa. The film's soundtrack includes hits from '70s greats Jethro Tull and Deep Purple.

Film on Cohen is 'right on'

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

Ladies and Gentlemen... Mr. Leonard Cohen, Donald Brittain's appealing biopic, preserves the droll, sardonic, youthful poet in amber.

Shot in black and white in Montréal in 1965, this one-hour documentary portrays Cohen as a singular and up-and-coming talent, a literary figure to watch.

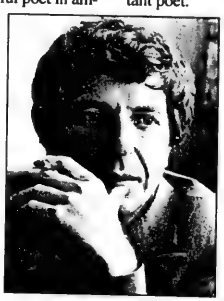
Deft and jazzy, Ladies and Gentlemen... will be screened by TVOntario on Thursday, May 3, at 10 p.m.

Cohen, then his in early 30s, comes across as smart, soulful and sassy as he recites his poetry, reminisces about his budding career, and relaxes with close friends.

As the film opens, Cohen is on a stage, performing like a standup comic as he keeps his audience suitably amused.

In flashbacks, Cohen recalls his childhood in wealthy Westmount and briefly describes his grandfather, a writer, and his father, a garment manufacturer. A grainy 1937 home movie clip shows Cohen standing beside the family's black chauffeur and car to match.

Filmed before Cohen acquired international fame as a folksinger, Ladies and Gentlemen... examines all the facets of his life, from his self-imposed "exile" in Greece to his habit of saving his personal letters because of his assumption that he would one day be an important poet.



Leonard Cohen in his youth.

Lest Cohen be misunderstood, the narrator quickly adds that he is not arrogant and despises literary pretension.

As the film unfolds, Cohen is seen strolling in Westmount, conversing easily with moderator Pierre Berton and fellow poet Irving Layton on a panel show, dropping into Ben's Delicatessen for a snack and a chat with its owner, talking with valued friends, slumbering in a hotel room and putting pen to paper as he composes a poem.

Reminded that he once fought to keep his McGill University fraternity entirely Jewish, Cohen blushes and admits to being embarrassed by his ethnocentrism.

As this classy film closes on a stylistic note, the narrator observes poetically: "There are dreams of glory whispering through the wires of his spine."

Right on, as they might have said in the 1960s.

Genetic testing must be voluntary, confidential: prof

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Could a killer plead not guilty because of his genetic make-up? Is genetic engineering permitted or forbidden? What are some of the ethical – and Jewish – issues involved in cloning humans?

Those were some of the issues discussed by Michel Revel, a professor in the department of molecular genetics (and virology) at the Weizmann Institute of Science in Rehovot, and Israel's representative to UNESCO's international committee of bioethics, at a recent lecture on the Human Genome: Mapping the Medical and Moral Implications.

Speaking at Beth Tzedec Congregation, in a lecture co-sponsored by the synagogue and the Canadian Society for the Weizmann Institute of Science, Revel, 62, said there are many more questions than answers arising from the Human Genome Project, a world-wide effort to decipher the human genetic code.

It would be a catastrophe to believe that heredity dictates what it means to be human, said Revel. "All the education, the love you get in the first year of life, the input...this is what makes us human."

The idea that man can overcome certain tendencies or choose whether to use them for good or evil appears in the Talmud, said Revel, an observant Jew and recipient of the Israel Prize for Medicine in 1999. As one example, he noted that humans have "genes which can increase somewhat the tendency to be aggressive, but no gene that can be called the gene for aggressivity."

The human genome is comprised of only 30,000 genes – a surprising finding, noted the native of Strasbourg, France, who made aliyah with his family in 1968.

"We're not so different from other mammals, even fruit-flies or worms [in that respect]," he said. What does differentiate humans is that the brain continues to grow during the first year of life at the same rate as before birth, he said. "This difference is what could be most important in humanization from the scientific point of view."

From a genetic standpoint, humans are "99.9 percent identical," said Revel, 62. The one percent difference is significant, however, as it represents a huge number of potential differences, creating variations in appearance, among other things.

Only eight percent of differences are between races, he noted.

Revel contends there is no specific Jewish ethnic disease, despite what textbooks and the media report. "Jews are good study subjects. They go to doctors."

The Human Genome Project has opened a new area of predictive medicine, said the professor. In fact, he noted, in the Orthodox community there is an organization that does genetic testing before a shidduch is actually made between prospective marriage partners. "If you don't marry through a shadchan, it's not so easy," Revel said.

He stressed the importance of genetic counselling to address issues such as the severity of a genetic disability, how treatable it is, and whether there is a basis for abortion.

Among the ethical issues he raised, Revel stressed that genetic testing must be both voluntary and confidential.

He also warned against the dangers of eugenics, recalling the Nazi regime's killing of the mentally disabled, which preceded killing of Jews and other groups, said Revel.

"Bad genes" is a term that should not be used, according to Revel. "It may lead [people] to consider entire groups as bad people." Nature is "morally neutral," he noted, adding that all humans carry abnormal recessive genes.

Human cloning should not be considered against human dignity, said Revel. Assisted reproductive technology like in vitro fertilization, which was once considered against human dignity, has allowed hundreds of thousands, if not millions of couples to have healthy children, he noted.

Halachically, he indicated, cloning – which could be used in cases of infertility or to prevent transmission of a genetic disease from one parent – is less problematic than in vitro fertilization using a donor sperm or egg, which could result in genetic siblings unknowingly marrying each other some day.

He noted that the technique for human cloning is not yet ready, and mentioned that even a cloned child, in effect a "genetic twin," would not be 100 percent identical to the parent.

About Nutrition

By LISA WEINBERG

Q. I am going to be travelling to Florida with my 10-month-old and eating almost exclusively in restaurants. Can you give me some tips as to what I can order for him in restaurants or bring with me in my diaper bag for safe and healthy meals for his age?

A. I just returned from two weeks in South Florida with my two-year-old and 10-month-old, and I have to say that feeding a young child in Florida restaurants was not without its challenges.

If your son is still willing to be spoon fed baby food (unlike mine), this will be your healthiest and safest choice. You can easily stock up on jars of baby food in a Florida grocery store and carry these non-perishable jars with you to restaurants. Make sure you read all labels on the foods you are going to give your son. Do not assume that foods you give him here are the same in the United States.

Remember babies under one year of age should not eat nuts, egg whites, honey, fish, shellfish or strawberries. This was where my obstacles started. Multigrain Cheerios (which my son eats mountains of at home) contain almond meal in the United States; arrowroot cookies, also safe here, contain eggs in the U.S.; and almost every bread I checked in the grocery store contained either eggs or honey.

The other obstacle I encountered in restaurants was that everywhere I asked, peanut oil was used for the french fries. I was absolutely shocked that while my two-year-old was presented with an adorably appropriate children's menu in almost every restaurant (inexpensive and upscale), they all use peanut oil – and not one made reference to this on the menu anywhere. We are so much more ahead in allergy awareness here.

When you arrive, visit a grocery store and stock up on safe dry cereals and infant cookies, and individual cans of fruit and apple sauce. If you have refrigeration in your hotel, grab some sliced cheese, frozen bagels, mini-yogurt (honey free) frozen mixed vegetables, pasta, frozen pizzas, etc. Remember not to assume anything. Read labels, ask questions, and don't introduce any new foods while you're away. Have an enjoyable trip, and for everyone travelling with small children, I hope this helps keep your kids safe.

Paul Godfrey named Maccabi Canada chef de mission

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Paul Godfrey remembers vividly the first time he attended the Maccabiah Games in 1981. Thousands of spectators had crammed into Ramat Gan Stadium and they were treated to a colourful pageant as hundreds of athletes wearing their national costumes paraded into the stadium for the Games' opening ceremonies.

It was a moment he still cherishes. "When you see all those Jewish athletes from around the world come into the stadium, your goosebumps get goosebumps," he said.

On July 16, Godfrey will enjoy his second Maccabiah Games opening ceremonies – only this time he'll be in the middle of the action instead of a spectator. Godfrey was recently named honorary chef de mission of the Canadian team at the Maccabiah Games. He will share the honour with Montrealer Ben Weider and follow in the footsteps of former Montreal Canadiens legend Jean Beliveau and businessman Charles Bronfman, who served as joint chefs de mission at the last Games in 1997.

Ben Weider shares honour

Godfrey's participation in the 2001 Games was announced officially earlier this week at a cocktail reception in SkyDome's Founders Club. The reception was chaired by a trio of corporate heavy hitters – Robert Lantos, Barry Sherman and Irv Ungerman – and was attended by about 100 business executives, Maccabi Canada officials and athletes.

In an interview with The CJN, Godfrey said he was honoured to be selected as chef de mission. "One is always proud to represent one's country, especially…in the State of Israel."

The Maccabiah Games "link Canada and Israel in an important way, and as a Jew and a Canadian, it allows me to carry Canada's flag in [our] homeland," he said.

Maccabi Canada president Roy Salomon said the selection of Godfrey continues a Maccabi tradition of choosing individuals "who our athletes can emulate, someone who gives back to his community."

Paul Godfrey

A family man who credits his wife Gina, and sons Rob, Noah and Jay for their support in his endeavours, Godfrey maintains numerous involvements in both the business and the philanthropic spheres. He established the Herbie Fund, which brings children from around the world to Toronto's Hospital for Sick Children if they cannot receive in their home countries the medical care needed for life-threatening illnesses.

He is a member of the board of the Baycrest Centre for Geriatric Care, the University of Toronto and several major corporations.

Beginning in 1964, he served in a variety of municipal government posts and in 1973, he was named Metro Toronto chairman, a position he held for 11 years. He later served in a number of senior executive posts at the Toronto Sun newspaper, and in 1996, he led a management buy-out of the Toronto Sun Publishing Corporation. The company is now owned by Quebecor, but Godfrey retains a seat on the board of directors.

Godfrey's involvement in the sports world is extensive. He is chair of the Molson Indy board of trustees and he was appointed president and CEO of the Toronto Blue Jays Baseball Club on Sept. 1, 2000. He recently joined the board of the Toronto Phantoms, a newly formed indoor football franchise headed by his son, Rob.

Godfrey has been in the forefront of efforts to bring a National Football League franchise to Toronto, and he is a key player in the Toronto 2008 Olympic bid.

Coincidentally, the IOC decision on the 2008 Olympics will be made in Moscow three days before the Maccabiah Games begin in Israel. Also on Godfrey's schedule in the week prior to the Games will be the Major League All-Star game in Seattle and the Phantoms' last home game, only two days prior to the opening ceremonies.

In a break from past tradition, the opening ceremonies have been moved from Ramat Gan, near Tel Aviv, to the Teddy Kollek Stadium in Jerusalem. The closing ceremonies will be held in Sultan's Pool, just outside the Old City walls.

Maccabi Canada will send as many as 375 athletes, coaches, trainers and officials to the Games – the largest number ever, said Allen Gerskup, chair of the national athletic committee. Fund-raising to support the team is still ongoing.

Israel drops in FIFA rankings

By Ha'aretz Sports Correspondents

JERUSALEM — Israel has dropped two places in the latest FIFA world rankings, now in 43rd position with 571 points.

Austria, which beat Israel 2-1 in the World Cup qualifier in Vienna last month, jumped eight places as a result of its victory to 37th place with 586 points.

Spain, another of Israel's opponents in qualifying Group 7, remains in seventh position in the standings with 725 points, while Bosnia, also in Group 7, moved up six places to 68th, with 499 points. Liechtenstein also improved, moving up four slots to 145 with 249 points.

Meanwhile, national team coach Richard Nielsen made two changes to the squad that lost to Austria last month, when he recalled the in-form Haim Revivo and Hapoel Petach Tikvah's Eyal Ben Ami to join the team in the game against Georgia in Tblisi next week.

It will be the last warmup game for the national team before the next World Cup qualifiers in June against Liechtenstein (away on June 2) and Spain (at home on June 6).

Out are team captain Tal Banin, and Everton's Idan Tal. Banin is ineligible to play against Liechtenstein after receiving a yellow card against Austria, while Tal is required by Everton as the English premier league season reaches its final stages.

Revivo, seen as the player who can still save Israel's World Cup hopes, returns after serving his one-match suspension, while Ben Ami was called to gain experience.

Nielsen kept faith with striker Alon Mizrahi who criticized him after the loss to Austria. Mizrahi says the team should have played with a striker.

"I do not argue with players through the media, my discussions with Alon Mizrahi will take place in private," Nielsen said when announcing the squad.

The Israeli team includes: Nir Davidovich; Shavit Elimelech; Arik Benado; Adoram Keisi; Amir Shelah; Gadi Brumer; Dedi Ben-Dayan; Shimon Gershon; Ofer Talkar; Oren Zeituni; Eyal Berkovic; Eyal Ben-Ami; Avi Nimni; Yossi Abuksis;Alon Mizrahi; Haim Revivo; Yossi Benayoun and Yaniv Katan.

ספרותנו

מאת: יעל זליגר

אבי

יהוה ישב עמנו ולא מש
כל שבעת ימי אבלות
כי איך יבדל מאתנו למנוחה
ואנחנו לבך בצער?...״
(דליה רביקוביץ)

הוא עמי וחוא לא מש ממני, אבי, זכרונו כולו ברכה. בן שמונים ושש היה בעת שנפטר אך נדמה שאף פעם לא היה איש זקן. שערותיו הלבינו אך כמילות השיר: ״...עוד תתפתנו להאמין שקדקדי מלבין - לא רבותי היקרים, זו רק דרכי להעריס... רק נסיון חוצץ, עד הזמן המתרוצץ... אני נשאר על הבמה לעוד זמן-מה...״ (ויורז ברסנס)

אכן, תמיד סבורה הייתי שאבי יישאר על הבמה לעוד זמן מה. עד יומו האחרון היה לי למשענת, לעוגן חיים.

מרטין זליגר נולד ב- 1914 באיזנאך שבגרמניה. הוא סיפר לי רבות אודות חיי התרבות העשירים בגרמניה ועל נופיה הקסומים. הוא ידע אנטישמיות אף שתמיד היה ממהר לציין בפני שלא כל הגרמנים היו אנטישמיים. יום אחד, בשנת סיום התיכון אמר לו מנהל בית הספר להימלט מגרמניה; והוסיף: אתה את נפשך עוד תוכל להציל, לא כן בני שלאסוציי כבר נטרפה דעתו והוא הפך לברירון נאצי.

מילדותו היה חבר פעיל בתנועת נוער ציונית. ב- 1936 קיבל התר לעלות ארצה והובטח לו שגם למשפחתו יינתן ההזדר. זה לא קרה וכל בני משפחת אבי נרצחו בשואה. לפני כ- 40 שנה הוזמן לשמש כפרופסור אורח באוניברסיטת היידלברג; כמענה אבי הודיע שהוא מעדיף להיות סנדלר בארץ ישראל מאשר פרופסור בגרמניה.

כסטודנט בירושלים ״גילה״ את מרטין בובר והתנלית חוללה מפנה בחייו. את דרכו המקצועית החל כמורה בתיכון, ולאחר מכן כמנהל תיכון ואת הסמינר למורים בבית ברל. במקביל כתב את עבודת הדוקטורט. כמרצה באוניברסיטה העברית בירושלים היה ממניחי היסוד למחלקה למדעי המדינה.

אבי לא ידע פשרות בתחומי הצדק החברתי וטהרת המחקר. הוא היה קפדן ומחמיר עם כל תלמידיו אך כולם ידעו שיותר מכל הוא דורש מעצמו.

בבית ידעתי שאסור להפריע לאבא בשעת עבודתו אך מותר היה לי להיכנס בשקט לחדרו ולשבת ולקרוא. כל-כך אהבתי את גודש הספרים בחדרו; מקדש אקדמאי. שעותינו היפות ביותר היו כאשר מדי פעם אבי היה מניח לעט הכתיבה ומכריז: הולכים לטייל! ידי בתוך ידו והוא היה מדריך אותי בנסתרות ירושלים, מספר לי על בובר וענגן. הוא רצה שכמותו, אוהב מוסיקה קלאסית. בהיותי בגיל בת מצווה נסענו לרומא כי הוא רצה להעניק לי את חוויית האופרה. (באידה!)

לפני כמה שנים בא אלי בבקשה: ״בואי איתי לגרמניה, למקום הולדתי.״ ידי שלובה בידו, הוא הראה לי את הבית בו נולד, את בית-הספר, את המקום בו נורה למוות דודו בנסיון להימלט מהנאצים ואת תחנת הרכבת משם הובלו יהודי המקום ועמם בני משפחת אבי לפולין ומשם לאושוויץ. כאבו היה גדול מנשוא אך בבית הקברות היהודי ההרוס, כאשר פרצתי בבכי נוראי, הוא אסף אותי אליו ברחמים ואמר: ״אבל אנחנו עוד פה, יעל שלי.״

״שבעת ימים ושנים אין מספר
בכל עת שינוא רצון מלפנינו
כל אימת שהצער יגבר עלינו
עזוב יעזוב עמנו.״ (תרי״ג מצוות

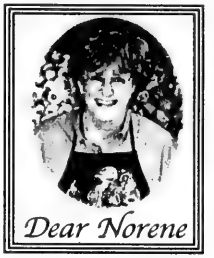
About Food



Dear Norene

By NORENE GILLETZ

Yom Ha'atzmaut, Israel's Independence Day, falls on April 26 this year. When I asked several Israeli friends how they were planning to celebrate, they replied, "with a barbecue, of course!"

According to Sheila Mendel, who is visiting Toronto from Kibbutz Ramat Hashofet, "The country looks like one giant smokestack! People are barbecuing everywhere, even in the middle of the street. Our kibbutz will have a giant barbecue, with steaks, kabobs, Israeli salad, hummus, tehina, pita and eggplant salad."

Israeli crowds feast on falafel, which is informally considered Israel's national dish. Since falafel is deep-fried and very high in fat, here is a great altemative. Try this delicious recipe for Grilled Falafel, so you can feel culinarily connected with Israel! It comes from Faye Levy's latest cookbook 1,000 Jewish Recipes. Serve it with Tahini Sauce from my cookbook MealLeaniYumm! B'tayavon!

GRILLED FALAFEL

6 large cloves garlic
1/3 cup fresh cilantro or Italian parsley
1 medium onion
3 cups canned or cooked chickpeas, well-drained
2 1/2 tsp. ground cumin
2 tsp.ground coriander
1/2 tsp.salt
1/2 tsp.pepper
pinch of cayenne pepper
2 tbsp.bread crumbs
1 large egg white

Mince garlic and cilantro in food processor. Add onion to mixture in processor and mince it by pulsing. Add chickpeas, cumin, coriander, salt, pepper cayenne and bread crumbs. Process with brief pulses to a chunky puree, scraping down sides occasionally. Add egg white and process until blended. Transfer to a bowl. Mix well.

Shape mixture into 8 smooth patties. Pack mixture firmly when shaping so that falafel holds together.

Heat grill and brush with oil. Grill falafel patties over medium heat about 5 minutes per side or until slightly firm on top, turning patties over carefully with 2 spatulas. Serve hot.

Serving Suggestions: Serve these the Israeli way, inside a split, very fresh pita with several spoonfuls of Israeli salad. Add pickles, hot sauce and tahini sauce.
Yield: 4 servings, 8 patties.

TAHINI SAUCE

1/2 cup tahini (sesame seed paste)
1/4 cup water
1 clove garlic, crushed
1/3 tbsp. fresh lemon juice (to taste)
salt to taste
cumin, optional

Place tahini in a jar. Add water and mix well. Add remaining ingredients and shake until blended. Makes about 1 1/4 cups. Keeps about 2 weeks in the refrigerator.

Fat-Saving Secret! Instead of stirring tahini before you measure it, pour off oil which has risen to the top of the jar and discard it.
